SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 7, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou art the giver of every good and perfect gift. We come reverently before Thee to seek Thy blessing. These, Thy servants, have assembled to administer the sacred trust that has been committed to them in the interest of all the people. We pray that God's presence may be with them, guiding them in their deliberations and the formation of their final conclusions, that in all the work they do Thy name may be glorified through the peace and prosperity of the Nation. For Christ's sake. Amen.

ALASKAN COAL.

Mr. JONES. I have resolutions adopted at a meeting of former residents of Alaska who are thoroughly familiar with the coal situation there in reference to the character of coal and the tests made by the Government. I ask that the resolutions may be printed in the RECORD; they are not long. I will not ask that they be read.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The "Yakima-Alaskan Sourdoughs," an organization composed of former residents of Alaska now residing in Yakima County, State of Washington, in meeting assembled at North Yakima, Wash., January 21, 1914, directed the executive committee of the organization to prepare resolutions on behalf of the organization, as follows:

"Whereas the test of the coal from the Bering River coal field in Alaska made by the United States Navy is reported unfavorable to said coal as suitable for use by the United States Navy; and

"Whereas it is reported that the coal used for said test was not a fair sample of Bering River coal, that the same was old surface coal and filled with dirt, and suspicious circumstances surrounded the obtaining of the same; and

"Whereas the United States Navy will soon make tests of coal of the Matanuska coal fields of Alaska to ascertain whether the same is suitable for use of the Navy: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we believe that the coal tested by the United States Navy as Bering River coal was not a fair and honest sample of coal from the Bering River coal field;

"That we believe that either careless, ignorant, or dishonest methods were used in obtaining the coal tested so as to prevent a fair and honest sample of said Bering River coal being furnished for testing by the United States Navy;

"That knowledge of said coal for many years causes us to believe that a test of a fair sample of said coal will show that the same is a high-grade coal, suitable for use on naval vessels; and

"Resolved, That we believe the same methods that were used with the Bering River coal will be used to prevent a fair sample of Matanuska coal being furnished for testing by the United States Navy unless proper care and diligence is used regarding the same; and further

"Resolved, That we look with confidence to Hon. W. L. JONES, Senator from the State of Washington, and Hon. JAMES WICKERSHAM, Delegate to Congress from Alaska, to see that proper safeguards are used to insure an honest and fair sample of the Matanuska coal being obtained for the United States Navy to test the same for naval use; and

"Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to Hon. W. L. JONES and Hon. JAMES WICKERSHAM.

NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN & HARTFORD RAILROAD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 260, by Mr. NORRIS, requesting the Interstate Commerce Commission to reopen its examination of the affairs of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words on the resolution. I do not know the exact form the resolution is ultimately to take, but am very much in favor of some resolution of this kind. It is especially appropriate at this particular time, while the question of increased railway rates is before the Interstate Commerce Commission, that the people of the country should be enlightened as they have been by the discussion on this floor of the charges that have been made by a very responsible paper.

I do not think, Mr. President, while the scoundrelism in the old management of the New York, New Haven & Hartford is before the public that the equal scoundrelism of the Frisco Railroad should be absolutely lost to the public gaze. These two institutions seem to have been twins in infamy. There is even a broader question as affecting our welfare in disclosures of this kind and in manipulations of this kind than the mere question of robbing the stockholders, which is bad enough, and that is the effect that such transactions have upon our securities in this country and abroad. The report of the commission in the Frisco hearing condemned certain banking houses that had taken the obligations of the Frisco Co. when they knew, according to the report, that the Frisco Co. was on the verge of bankruptcy. That drew from one of the banking houses a letter which was sent, I assume, to every Member of the Senate, from Speyer & Co., of New York. I wish to put a little of that in the RECORD. They say:

> You state in your report that "the sale of securities to the investing public through the bankers at a time when every appearance indicated the insolvency of the issuing company invites and warrants condemnation of all those who assisted or participated in such sale."

Then Messrs. Speyer & Co. go ahead and give themselves a certificate of character, but they do not answer the charge that through foreign bankers they sold these securities or placed them on the market and destroyed or helped to destroy the confidence which foreign people had in our investments and our securities. There are other Senators here, I think, who perhaps have more definite knowledge than I have on that question.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will yield to me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KENYON. I am glad to do so.

Mr. LODGE. On the point that the Senator from Iowa has just raised, it seems to me that it is a subject which ought to be investigated. I believe it was Speyer & Co.——

Mr. KENYON. Speyer & Co.

Mr. LODGE. It was Speyer & Co. who sent the circular and apparently had the loan. I do not know how much of that loan was placed abroad, but a large part of it was certainly placed in Paris. In that circular Speyer & Co. state that their own commissions were very moderate, but if I have been correctly informed, and what I have heard comes from the other side of the water, the loan of the San Francisco company was largely placed in Paris. The condition of the road was pretty well known in this country. It was not easy to place it on the New York market or any other large American market. The loan therefore was taken to Paris. I understand, and if I am wrong an investigation will correct me, all the leading Paris bankers were induced to take up the loan and endeavor to sell the securities by receiving a very large commission, which I have heard it stated was as high as 7½ per cent. The people of France have no knowledge of an American investment. They knew nothing about this road of their own knowledge. They depend upon the banking institutions of their own country to guide them in an investment of that kind. The loan was put out in that way. The bankers took it up, incited to do so by the great commissions that were paid to them, and a large part of the loan, at least, was placed in that way in France. Within two or three months, I do not know just how soon after the placing of the loan, but within a very short time, the railroad went into bankruptcy, and those people abroad found themselves the victims of what they regarded as a simple swindle.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator who were the losers in that transaction. Who were those people?

Mr. LODGE. They were the investors in France, the great bankers of Paris being all substantially, as I have been informed, engaged in placing these bonds.

Mr. KENYON. And receiving a large commission?

Mr. LODGE. Receiving a large commission for doing so; they had no difficulty in placing them, because their constituency was wholly ignorant and relied on them.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Does not the fact that they exacted a very large commission evidently show that they were acquainted with the character of the securities?

Mr. LODGE. I think that would be quite a reasonable inference; but certainly they were paid a large commission for what they did.

Mr. KENYON. The American bankers at least were acquainted with the character of the security. The commission so stated in its report.

Mr. LODGE. The commission makes that statement, but the commission does not go into the transaction abroad. The result of it was to give a worse blow to American credit and the standing of American business and American securities abroad than we have ever received. I think it is a very serious thing to have injured the good business name of this country in such a way.

These facts have come to me and have been told me on what I believe to be good authority. As I said, they came from the direction of people who were victims in Paris. I think it is something which ought to be known; we can not probably do anything about it here in the way of prosecution, but at least it should be known what methods have been employed in the placing of a loan abroad, which, in its results, have injured the good name of the United States and the American credit throughout Europe.

Mr. KENYON. I am very thankful to the Senator for injecting these remarks in what I have to say.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Iowa if the firm of Speyer & Co. are not the authorized fiscal agents of the United States in London?

Mr. LODGE. Yes, they are; they have been made so since the 4th of March.

Mr. OLIVER. Appointed by the President.

Mr. KENYON. I did not know about that. I am glad to have that information.

Mr. LODGE. I am not sure, but I think that is the case.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In England only.

Mr. LODGE. In England they are the agents of the United States. They have taken the place of the Seligmans, I think, in London.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the suggestions of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts show that these genteel financial plunderers are not only robbing their stockholders, but that they are robbing American credit of its standing abroad as well as at home.

I had intended to read into the RECORD an editorial from which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] read yesterday. I will not take the time, however, to read it, but wish to have it made a part of my remarks. It states the situation very clearly; and I think the New York World is entitled to the thanks of the American people for exposing the tale of infamy that the Senator read yesterday—the exposé of as corrupt a gang of financial plunderers as ever robbed a bank, and without requiring the same amount of courage that it does to rob a bank. They belong rather to that class of guardians who would rob their wards. These men, intrusted with the funds, with the property, with the management of great institutions such as the Frisco and the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, instead of using this property to help their stockholders, have been plundering them.

I suppose it must be a great deal of satisfaction to the hardy Puritan of New England, who has a little stock, as thousands of them have, in the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co.—and as many whom I know, whose husbands left them this stock, considering it as good as Government bonds—for his little household, as they gather around their breakfast table in the morning, limited possibly to codfish and Uneeda Biscuits, to pour out their blessings to Providence, not that the Democratic Party has revised the tariff and attempted to reduce the cost of living, but that the directors of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. have made it impossible for them to overeat, at least. Then, as that sturdy New England character goes in and sits by his fireside, he can pick up a book that is now being circulated free all over the United States by the railroads at the expense of the people who are paying railroad fares and freight rates, describing the great blessings of the splendid management of railroads in this country and the terrible danger of governmental ownership and control; and as he draws his enthusiasm from that, he can wonder why, when these matters have been public matters for many years, if he goes out and steals a bucket of coal or a loaf of bread for his family, he will go to jail, while these eminent gentlemen, who have stolen what he had, instead of going to jail, will go to Europe or to some villa somewhere or upon an automobile or yachting party trip or give great banquets and luncheons costing the sums which the Senator from Nebraska yesterday showed were spent by directors and included in "other expenses." That sturdy New England character, that splendid character, is going to wonder why it is that Congress sits around with bills before committees that would remedy this evil, bills that sleep the sleep that in all human probability never will know any awakening.

Mr. President, I did not intend to say as much as I have. I now ask that this editorial of the New York World on "A chapter of financial infamy," which concludes with the significant words, "There can be no 'constitution of peace' with piracy and plunder," be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

A CHAPTER OF FINANCIAL INFAMY.

The World to-day undertakes to show what became of the $12,000,000 of money belonging to the stockholders of the New Haven, which, according to Chairman Prouty of the Interstate Commerce Commission, "vanished into thin air."

Needless to say this money did not vanish "into thin air." It vanished into the coffers of J. P. Morgan & Co. It was taken out of the treasury of the New Haven by Mr. Morgan and his associates to recompense J. P. Morgan & Co. for loans they had made practically without security to a dummy corporation, organized to conceal various financial manipulations in connection with the construction of the Westchester road. Even the exposure of life insurance corruption revealed no more cold-blooded piece of Wall Street piracy than the transaction whose scaly history is printed elsewhere in to-day's issue of the World.

Whoever wishes to know how the stockholders of a great railroad company can be swindled, robbed, and ruined by due process of law is invited to study carefully the steps by which the Westchester road was unloaded upon the unfortunate New Haven after President Mellen had informed the New Haven directors that the Westchester stock was worth "about 10 cents a pound." Whoever wishes to understand the cold, calculated villany by which the New Haven has been bled white, and its helpless stockholders cheated of the dividends which represent the only means of support that thousands of them have, is invited to study this chronicle of "high finance" to the last, least line.

If J. P. Morgan and his associates had gone into the offices of the New Haven, blown open the safe, and stuffed these millions into their pockets, they would have been guilty of burglary. But what a burglar might have done brazenly and defiantly they accomplished by stealth and cunning. In the long run the New Haven would have been better off if they had stolen this money outright from its safe, for then it would not have been saddled with the continuing burden of the Westchester, which is a steady drain upon its resources.

Thousands of men are in jail for offenses against society which were picayunish in comparison with this stupendous achievement in respectable robbery. It would be bad enough if the Westchester transaction stood by itself, but it is only one link in a long chain of financial infamy by which one of the richest railroad systems in the country was sold into slavery.

Mr. Morgan is dead, but his estate is not dead. His executors still hold the tainted profits that were acquired in this transaction and the courts are open to the New Haven stockholders to sue for restitution. Mr. Morgan is beyond the reach of the law, but his associates who are still living are not beyond the reach of the law. Guilt in their case is still personal, and if they can not be punished under any State statute for the grosser offenses, these offenses were nevertheless part of the violation of the Sherman antitrust law to which the New Haven, as a corporation, has confessed. Whatever measure of mercy and immunity is shown toward the corporation, there should be neither mercy nor immunity for directors who participated in the colossal swindles by which the New Haven has been brought to the verge of bankruptcy. Here is the time, place, and occasion for the Wilson administration to erect its gibbet of shame and prove again that the criminal statutes of the United States know neither rich nor poor.

There can be no "constitution of peace" with piracy and plunder.

Mr. WEEKS obtained the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if my colleague will allow me a moment, I wish to state that I find in the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the San Francisco Railroad that receivers were applied for on May 27, 1913. The report states that—

The Frisco sold to Speyer & Co., of New York, shortly before the receivers were appointed, $3,000,000 of its general-lien 5 per cent bonds, French series, at a price of 78.

Those bonds were sold to French investors on April 24, May 2, May 10, and May 14, 1913; and on May 27, 1913, the receivers were applied for. Such transactions do not give us a very good reputation abroad.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, understanding that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was contemplating offering a resolution of inquiry into the affairs of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., and finding it necessary to be absent from the Chamber last Tuesday, I asked him to offer the resolution when I could be present, because I might wish to submit some comments on it and on conditions in New England. The Senator very courteously made the statement on introducing the resolution last Tuesday that he wished it to go over on account of the arrangement he had made with me, and I wish now to express my appreciation to him for having done so.

I rise now to advocate and indorse the general purposes of the resolution which the Senator has introduced. It is unnecessary to go into the conditions as they exist in New England at this time, but the fact is that the Boston & Maine Railroad Co. and the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., both of which have been dividend-paying properties for more than 40 years, are in serious financial distress.

There are different reasons for this condition. It can not be charged that the Boston & Maine Railroad is in that condition for the same reason that the New York, New Haven & Hartfort Railroad is, because the Boston & Maine Railroad has not been making additions to its properties and taking on other properties during the immediate past. The New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad has done so to a very large degree, as has been stated on this floor, adding to its capitalization more than $300,000,000 in one form or another.

I am not prepared, and I do not think any man is prepared, to state definitely whether there has been any looting of the New Haven properties or the New Haven treasury in so doing, whether there has been bad judgment used in so doing, or whether in the end it may be advantageous in some degree to the railroad situation in New England; but it has, for the time being at least, seriously injured a great number of stockholders in New England and elsewhere, and it has impaired the confidence which the public is justified in having in good railroad management in this country.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has made very careful investigations into some phases of this condition. I do not know exactly how far they have gone, but Mr. Commissioner Prouty states, in a letter to the Senate, which came as a result of an inquiry from the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce [Mr. NEWLANDS], that they have investigated as far as the commission believes it has power to do, but that there is a large amount of information obtained by the commission which has not been made public which might answer all of the purposes of the Senate. When that information has been furnished to the Senate, if additional investigation is required in any form, it seems to me that that will be the time to ask that it be made. In the meantime I am going to support the resolution as introduced by the Senator from Nebraska, because I for one, representing in part a great New England State, wish to have every ray of light which can be found let in on the affairs of this corporation.

If there have been men in responsible positions guilty of looting those properties, I want them sufficiently and adequately punished. In any event, this is a time when the stockholders of those railroads and the people of New England may justly say, "Give us all the information there is, so that we may have an adequate and correct basis on which to reestablish the credit of these properties and put them in proper condition to adequately serve that community."

I should support the resolution anyway, but I hope the Senator from Nebraska will modify the preamble sufficiently so that we may ask for all the information which the Interstate Commerce Commission has on the subject and also ask for further investigation if the commission thinks further investigation should be given. If that should not be sufficient, we may then proceed to make such further investigation as the Senate may believe necessary, in order that we may have all the information which bears on this important subject.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I shall support the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] with the greatest relish. The story which has been published in the New York World and which has been recited by the Senator from Nebraska is not altogether new in character. I am old enough to remember the looting and piratical robbery of the old Erie Railroad, when Jay Gould and Jim Fiske, who were the participators in that robbery, fled from the city of New York over to New Jersey and domiciled themselves in a little hotel in order to prevent the possible service of legal processes on them. It was a horrible scandal. Fortunes were wrecked that a few men might be enriched. So these incidents are not new in our history. I feel that this looting of the New York & New Haven Railroad is only a revival; it has only broken out through the thin shell which concealed it.

I had a letter from a woman, who described herself as a widow with two children, living in New Haven, in which you could almost see the tears in her eyes. She said the little that was left to her by her husband from hard work and hard toil on his part and on her own part, because she shared with him as a toiler, was stored up in the stock of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad. She says, "We thought it as good as gold, and held on to it. To-day we are bereft of an income, and Heaven only knows what shall become of me and my children." Why she should have written to me I do not know, although I am frank to say that my heart beats and swells in sympathy for those who have been made the victims of a condition of this kind. She asks if something may not be done by the great United States toward ferreting out the wrong and demanding restitution, if possible, of the money of which she has been robbed.

I feel, Mr. President, that we have definite knowledge. The Senator from Massachusetts says that we can not absolutely charge that this money was stolen, but the fact remains that these men are as chary of publicity as the average mortal, and yet there is not a mother's son of them who has come out and denied the charges made by the New York World. I believe those charges are true.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. I think the Senator from New Jersey and I only differ in the character of our language in this matter. It is true that the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. did make a very comprehensive reply to the statement made by Mr. Commissioner Prouty sometime ago, but I do not think it ought to be charged against that corporation that it has not made a definite reply to the New York World article, because that was published only last Sunday.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That is true; but they have had time since that publication of last Sunday to give us some reason to believe that the charges made were false.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes, Mr. President; but——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Railroad reports and the thimble-rigging tabulations of scheming bankers will deceive the best of us, and I feel that I can get no knowledge as to their methods or as to their honesty through the report, of which I have seen a synopsis prepared by the New York & New Haven Railroad. I trust this measure——

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SAULSBURY in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that the charges contained in the New York World of last Sunday, which I have quoted, are not the first charges made by that paper. They have been making similar charges for the last several weeks.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Oh, yes. As I have said, it is as old as the hills; but this has happened to be the time when it has broken through the shell. The public mind has been blunted. We have seen the thing go on, as I have said, from the days of the Erie looting, and we had a taste of it in the New York insurance scandal, because of which a certain individual very prominent in insurance affairs went to Europe, and lives to-day in glory in "gay Paree," where it is said he wears gilt buckles on his shoes; and yet through his manipulations and those of others hundreds of men were bereft of their money. I say that any other course than sifting this to the very bottom will not satisfy the ends of justice or satisfy the public demands.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, when the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] was on the floor I asked if the firm of Speyer & Co. were not the fiscal agents of this Government in London. I was not quite certain at that time whether such was the case or not; but I find that the nomination of this firm as fiscal agents for the Navy Department was sent to the Senate in April by the President, and afterwards, on the 1st of May, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], chairman of the Finance Committee, reported from that committee and asked for immediate consideration of a resolution confirming the appointment, which was adopted. I send that resolution to the desk and ask the Secretary to read it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. When was that?

Mr. OLIVER. On the 1st day of May.

Mr. TOWNSEND. 1913?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether that appointment was before or after the failure of the Frisco road?

Mr. OLIVER. I think it was before the failure.

Mr. LODGE. It was before the appointment of receivers. The nomination of this firm of bankers came to the Senate in April. The Senate decided, very properly, that such agents were not officers of the United States and were not subject to confirmation by the Senate, and then passed the resolution which the Secretary is about to read, approving the appointment. The deal in French bonds was going on at the time, but application for the appointment of receivers was not made until the 27th of May.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate approve the appointment of the Right Hon. Sir Edgar Speyer, Bart., P. C., and the Messrs. Henry Oppenheimer, Henry William Brown, Henry Gordon Leith, James Speyer, and Eduard Beit von Speyer, trading under the name, style, and firm of Speyer Bros., at London, England, to be special fiscal agents of the Navy Department at that place, agreeably to the nomination.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not intend at this time to take up the time of the Senate, but it seems to me that the reading into the RECORD yesterday of a letter from a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission and a letter of Judge Prouty, who made the report of the commission at the time of the investigation of the New Haven Railroad affairs, requires some comment and perhaps makes it necessary to make some amendment of the resolution.

I stated yesterday that I believe anyone who will examine the report of Judge Prouty will agree with me that it shows on its face that the investigation of the affairs of this road was not complete. As far as the report is concerned, it does not attempt to trace many millions of the money that it shows were unlawfully taken from the stockholders of the company. In the space of nine years $204,000,000 was diverted into investments that were not properly connected with the railroad. Of course that was not all a loss, because they got something for it; but the report shows several places where amounts as high as twelve and thirteen million dollars, as Judge Prouty said, "vanished into thin air."

If the commission have in their possession information that has not been communicated to Congress and is not referred to in the opinion of Judge Prouty, of course it would be useless to make another investigation for the purpose of getting the same information. I do not want to duplicate the work. In my judgment, from all I have learned in regard to it and what I have in a very brief way tried to state to the Senate, the Interstate Commerce Commission have not exhausted the subject and have not exhausted all their powers in the matter. In order that there may be no question about it, however, I send to the desk an amendment to the resolution that I think will cover the matter in dispute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the first five lines of the resolution as printed and in lieu thereof to insert:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be requested to make public the facts in its possession concerning the financial transactions of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., and, so far as it may be necessary to get additional information to thoroughly cover the subject, to reopen the examination of the affairs of that company and make a further investigation of its financial transactions with a view to ascertaining—

Mr. NORRIS. So that the body of the resolution will remain just as it is, with the exception of the introductory part, which will make it unnecessary, of course, for them to make any investigation in regard to any facts they may have in their possession.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I will ask the Senator from Nevada if he has any objection to the amendment?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I was about to state that with the amendment suggested by the Senator from Nebraska the resolution is entirely satisfactory to me. I will say that I made inquiry of the Attorney General this morning, and he informed me that the offenses would come under State laws and would have to be prosecuted by the State officials.

Of course we all know that, owing to the inertia of the local authorities, the National Government has been compelled in many cases to enter upon an enlargement of its criminal jurisdiction under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution; and if that inertia continues to prevail in the various States it may be necessary for us to have national legislation upon the subject. I feel assured, however, that the local authorities in New England will take hold of the criminal phase of this matter vigorously.

So far as the resolution in its present form is concerned, it seems to me it will serve a very useful purpose, and that we will have the recommendations of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the legislation necessary to prevent the recurrence of similar transactions. I am, therefore, in hearty accord with the resolution as amended by the Senator from Nebraska.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska offer this as a modification of the original resolution?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I simply wish to put in one more quotation from the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission on the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad matter. I quoted what they said about the placing in Paris of the bonds of the French series. Then the commission say:

Speyer & Co. should have been aware of the poverty of the Frisco and of its difficulties in obtaining funds, as they advanced that company, on April 24, $725,000 on its demand note, and $50,000 on its demand note dated April 29, and applied the proceeds of the sale of $1,000,000 of these bonds—

That is, the bonds they were planting in Paris—

on May 2 to the liquidation of these notes.

That was to pay themselves. They did that while they held the position of agents of the United States. Though the French people and investing public may be very wrong, they not only think it is a reflection on American business methods and the honor of the business men of the United States, but they think such conduct is a reflection on the United States, whose fiscal agents this firm were.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be requested to make public the facts in its possession concerning the financial transactions of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., and, so far as it may be necessary to get additional information to thoroughly cover the subject, to reopen the examination of the affairs of that company and make a further investigation of its financial transactions, with a view to ascertaining—

First. What became of the funds of said company invested in the various enterprises and corporations mentioned in the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 2384, case No. 4845, entitled "The New England investigation in the matter of rates, classifications, regulations, and practices of carriers," submitted May 20, 1913, and decided June 20, 1913.

Second. Whether the person or persons authorizing such investment of the funds of said company and the person or persons receiving the benefit thereof are liable to punishment under existing laws.

Third. Whether, under existing law, such funds so invested can be recovered on behalf of the stockholders of said company.

Fourth. What legislation, if any, is necessary to prevent the recurrence of similar transactions.

THE NAVAL MILITIA.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 8667.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8667) to promote the efficiency of the Naval Militia, and for other purposes.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be read first for committee amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, with amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, in section 5, page 4, line 23, before the word "appointment," to strike out "professional"; in line 24, before the word "examination," to insert "professional"; and on page 5, line 20, after the words "And provided further," to strike out "That when vessels in the service of the United States, commanded by Naval Militia officers, cooperate or act in conjunction with vessels commanded by officers of the Navy, the exercise of command over such combined force shall be determined by the rank which such commanding officers hold, except that, for the purposes of this proviso, Naval Militia captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders shall be junior to lieutenant commanders of the Navy, unless specially certified for a higher grade by examination held under the authority of the Secretary of the Navy" and insert "That Naval Militia officers mustered as such into the service of the United States under the provisions of this act shall rank with but after officers of the Regular Navy in the same grade and rank; except that for the purpose of determining who shall exercise command over a combined force, composed of vessels commanded by Naval Militia officers and of vessels commanded by officers of the Navy acting in conjunction, all officers of the Naval Militia of or above the rank of lieutenant commander will be regarded as junior to lieutenant commanders of the Navy," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That every officer and enlisted man of the Naval Militia who shall be called forth in the manner hereinbefore prescribed shall be mustered for service without further appointment or enlistment, and without further professional examination previous to such muster, except for those States and Territories and the District of Columbia, if the case may so be, which have not adopted a standard of professional and physical examination prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy for the Naval Militia, and whose officers and petty officers shall not have been examined and found qualified in accordance therewith by boards of officers which shall be appointed by said Secretary: Provided, however, That any officer or enlisted man of the Naval Militia so qualified who shall refuse or neglect to present himself for such muster upon being called forth as herein prescribed, shall be subject to trial by court-martial and shall be punished as such court-martial may direct: Provided further, That when in the service of the United States, officers of the Naval Militia may serve on courts-martial for the trial of officers and men of the Regular or Naval Militia Service, but in the cases of courts-martial convened for the trial of officers of the Regular Service, the majority of the members shall be officers of the Regular Service; and officers and men of the Naval Militia may be tried by courts-martial the members of which are officers of the Regular or Naval Militia Service, or both: And provided further, That Naval Militia officers mustered as such into the service of the United States under the provisions of this act shall rank with but after officers of the Regular Navy in the same grade and rank; except that for the purpose of determining who shall exercise command over a combined force, composed of vessels commanded by Naval Militia officers and of vessels commanded by officers of the Navy acting in conjunction, all officers of the Naval Militia of or above the rank of lieutenant commander will be regarded as junior to lieutenant commanders of the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 10, page 8, line 9, after the word "District," to insert "made"; in line 13, after the word "made," to strike out "nor" and insert "or without"; and in line 23, after the words "United States," to strike out "except as hereinafter provided," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to procure, by purchase or manufacture, and issue from time to time to the Naval Militia such number of United States service or other arms, accessories, accouterments, equipment, uniforms, clothing, equipage, and military and naval stores of all kinds, under such regulations as he may prescribe, as are necessary to arm, uniform, and equip all of the Naval Militia in the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia in accordance with the requirements of this act without charging the cost or value thereof or any expense connected therewith against the allotment of such State, Territory, or District made from the annual appropriation provided for the arming and equipping of the Naval Militia in the annual appropriation for the Navy, or in any other general appropriation for the Naval Militia that may hereafter be made, or without requiring payment therefor, and to issue from time to time ammunition suitable for such arms as the Naval Militia of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia may be equipped with, and to exchange said arms, accessories, accouterments, equipment, equipage, stores, and ammunition when the same shall have become obsolete, without receiving any money credit therefor, for other arms, accessories, accouterments, equipment, equipage, stores, and ammunition suitable for the Naval Militia: Provided, That said property shall remain the property of the United States and be annually accounted for by the governor or other proper officer of the States, Territories, and the commanding general District of Columbia Militia: Provided further, That each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia shall, when and as required by the Secretary of the Navy, turn in to the Navy Department, or otherwise dispose of, in accordance with the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, without receiving any money credit therefor, and without expense for transportation or otherwise, such or all property theretofore issued under the provisions of this act. To provide means to carry into effect the provisions of this section, the necessary money to cover the cost of procuring, exchanging, or issuing of arms, accessories, accouterments, equipment, uniforms, clothing, equipage, ammunition, and military and naval stores to be exchanged or issued hereunder is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the sum expended in the execution of the purchases and issues provided for in this section shall not exceed the sum of $200,000 in any fiscal year: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy shall annually submit to Congress a report of expenditures made by him in the execution of the requirements of this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will call the attention of the Senator from Florida to line 8, page 3, and line 9, page 4, where the phraseology is used, "the laws of the Union." In all other instances in the bill the words "United States" are used, and I suggest to the Senator that it would be, perhaps, better to have it read "the laws of the United States."

Mr. BRYAN. Very well. In line 8, on page 3, I move to strike out the word "Union" and to insert "United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. On page 4, line 9, I move to strike out the word "Union" and insert the words "United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask to have printed in the RECORD that portion of the House report made by Mr. PADGETT, chairman of the House Committee on Naval Affairs, which I designate on this copy.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[House Report No. 94, Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

EFFICIENCY OF NAVAL MILITIA, ETC.

Mr. PADGETT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 8667):

The bill as amended meets the recommendations of the Navy Department, as well as the officers of the Naval Militia of the various States. At present there is no Organized Naval Militia, but many States of the Union have organizations which are independent and which are not subject to Federal control except wherein they receive the benefit of an annual appropriation of $125,000, distributed among the various State organizations proportionate to their strength at the rate of about $10 per man. In order that the State organizations may participate in this Federal appropriation the Navy Department attempts to require certain regulations to be enforced regarding the care of the equipment loaned to such organizations and in matters of the general efficiency of the personnel.

The provisions of the bill under consideration tend to promote the efficiency of the various Naval Militias, and creates an Organized Militia which, in time of war, under certain conditions, will be subject to Federal control. In time of peace the Navy Department shall have such control as to prescribe the physical, moral, and military qualifications of the officers and enlisted men thereof. It is believed, therefore, that a more useful auxiliary of the naval force will be created, a force well trained and ready for service at the outbreak of war, and yet so organized as not to destroy local interest and sentiment, which is essential to all volunteer organizations in time of peace.

The bill establishes and defines, as far as is practicable, the same relation between the Regular Navy of the United States and the Organized Naval Militia as exists between the Regular Army and the National Guard under the terms of what is known as the Dick bill. The bill carries an appropriation of $200,000 per year, and will make the allotment per man approximately the same as in the terms of the Dick bill for the National Guard.

The bill provides that enlistments in the Organized Militia shall be carried on under the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, which are, in fact, the same as required for entrance into the Regular Navy, and also provides for examinations of officers who may desire to qualify for commissions in the Regular Navy in the event of war.

It is not contemplated that the Organized Naval Militia shall enter the naval service of the United States in time of war as separate and distinct organizations in charge of fighting ships, but that the organizations may be divided up among the various fighting vessels in the battle line and its officers disseminated throughout the fleet. Experience has shown that with the limited Federal control possessed by the Navy Department at present, the State Naval Militia organizations as they exist to-day are efficient and perform excellent work during their summer maneuvers with the fleet, where they drill side by side with the regular officers and men of the Navy.

The Naval Militia at the outbreak of the Spanish War actually furnished in the war 3,332 officers and men, and so efficient was their work during the war that they received favorable commendation from their various commanding officers of the Regular Navy, and the strength of the Naval Militia in the various States grew to about 5,500 men and became a most valuable recruiting bureau for the Navy Department. The militia of the various States to-day numbers about 8,126 efficient and well-trained officers and men. If this bill be enacted into law, the President, in the event of war, can call upon these men, and the department states that they can be on board ship in fighting condition within a very short period of time.

Furthermore, the naval service has become so technical in character that those who would volunteer for duty in the service in time of need should be provided with facilities for perfecting themselves in the essentials of the service in time of peace. The Naval Militia of the various States is composed of highly trained mechanics and engineers, whose daily trades and professions particularly fit them for the technical service of the Navy. It is therefore on the Naval Militia that the department may largely depend for skilled artisans and technically trained men who have sufficient training in the naval side of their respective trades or professions to make them valuable for immediate service at any time.

Strength of Naval Militia organizations as reported on July 1, 1913.

In connection with the questions bearing upon the existing requirements in the various militias as to physical qualifications and professional qualifications the following excerpts from the Militia Law and Regulations of the State of Massachusetts are given as a general example:

"REGULATIONS, ARTICLE 4.

"SEC. 74. Every candidate for admission to the Massachusetts Volunteer Militia must be an able-bodied male of 18 years or upward.

"Enlistment.

"78. Officers making enlistments will prepare these rolls in triplicate.

"79. Company commanders, immediately upon making enlistments, will notify recruits to appear before them to sign the enlistment rolls, and, after physical examination by a medical officer, will then order the recruits to appear at such time and place as shall be appointed for muster.

"80. In signing enlistment rolls recruits will sign the Christian names in full.

"81. In the case of a regiment the companies of which are scattered in such a manner that the recruits can not, without much expense, go to a medical officer, the regimental commander will order such officer to travel to the armories of companies having recruits to muster, notifying the company commanders of such visit, and ordering them to have their recruits ready for examination at a stated time.

"MILITIA LAW.

"SEC. 84. The officers named in the preceding section as recruiting officers shall be mustering officers for mustering in and administrating the prescribed oath of enlistment to all soldiers enlisted by them. Mustering officers shall forward to the commander in chief, through the proper military channels, the returns of the enlistment and muster in of soldiers as soon as practicable and not later than 10 days thereafter. Such returns shall be in such form and accompanied by such certificates, descriptive lists, and other information relating to the recruit as may be required by law or prescribed in orders by the commander in chief. But no recruit shall knowingly and intentionally be accepted who is not eligible for enlistment under the law or who is physically or otherwise below the standard prescribed by the commander in chief. No recruit having been accepted shall be mustered into the service until all the requirements of the statute law, of the militia regulations, and of all proper orders relating to the enlistment and muster in of soldiers have been complied with.

EXHIBIT A.

EXAMINING BOARDS.

"SEC. 61. Commissioned officers—except the staff officers of the commander in chief, medical officers, veterinarians, and chaplains—shall, upon being notified as provided in section 51, appear before a board of three medical officers, which shall examine the officers who appear before it as to their physical fitness to perform their duties. Such officers as said board finds to be physically competent, and so certifies, shall thereafter appear before an examining board, consisting of not less than five nor more than seven officers designated by the commander in chief. Members of said board shall not take part in the examination of or give any opinion, information, or advice as to the fitness or competence of any officer who has any business or family connection with them or might, as a result of the examination, come under their immediate command. The commander in chief may, if he thinks it necessary, make a temporary detail to fill a vacancy in said board caused by temporary ineligibility or absence.

"SEC. 62. A complete record shall be kept by the secretary of the board, elected by the board from its members, of all meetings of the board. Such record shall embrace a statement at length of the proceedings, including the names of the members present, the name of any officer temporarily assigned for duty upon the board, the name of any officer who is absent and the cause of his absence, the name of every officer examined and the questions put to him, with his answers, and copies of all communications from and the originals of all communications to the board, with the findings and action of the board in each case and the reasons therefor. Such record shall be submitted to the board at its next meeting thereafter for approval or correction.

"SEC. 63. After receiving from the board of medical officers a certificate of physical competency in the case of each officer who appears before it, the examining board shall examine all such officers as to their military, moral, and general qualifications as hereinafter set forth, and shall administer the oaths prescribed by section 73. If, in the opinion of the board, the officer is competent, it shall so certify to the commander in chief, who shall issue his order announcing the result of the examination. If the officer fails to pass a satisfactory examination, the board shall so notify him, and he may, within 10 days after the time when he receives such notice, appeal for a reexamination to the commander in chief, who may, after an examination of the record of the case, order a reexamination of such officer before said board or before a board convoked by him for the purpose.

"SEC. 64. Medical officers and veterinarians shall appear before an examining board, consisting of three medical officers designated by the commander in chief, which shall certify the competency of such officer, or give its reasons for refusing so to certify, and in case of a refusal it shall transmit the complete record, with its reasons for refusal, to the commander in chief. It shall administer the oaths prescribed for other commissioned officers.

"SEC. 65. An officer who fails to appear before a board of examiners within 40 days after the date of his election or appointment, and who does not furnish satisfactory explanation of his absence, or who fails to pass a satisfactory examination before the board authorized to examine or reexamine him, shall forthwith be discharged by the commander in chief; but such officer may enlist to secure continuous service, and his enlistment shall date from the day of his election to the office for which he failed to pass a satisfactory examination if he so enlists within 30 days after the date of his discharge from the office to which he was elected. A commissioned officer who has been discharged by reason of failure to pass a satisfactory examination shall not be eligible for election or appointment to a commission within two months after such discharge.

"SEC. 66. An officer resigning his commission may enlist to secure continuous service, and his enlistment shall date from the day of his resignation if he is mustered within 30 days thereafter.

"SEC. 67. Examinations for staff positions, except for members of the staff of the commander in chief, medical officers, and veterinarians, may be of such general character as to experience and moral and military qualifications as the board may in each case determine. A staff officer shall at his request, or if the board so orders, be examined in the manner provided for other officers.

"SEC. 68. Other officers shall be examined by written questions prepared in advance, equal in number and as nearly as possible equal in difficulty for officers of the same grade, the answers to which shall be in writing; but such questions may be greater in number and difficulty for officers of higher grades. A number of sets of such questions for the several grades shall be prepared in advance, under the direction of the board, for examination of officers of the several grades. No special set of questions shall be used in the examination of any officer. All questions propounded in examinations as to the technical military qualifications of an officer shall be based on military textbooks of recognized authority, to be selected from time to time by the examining board. The titles of all books so selected and the number required shall be furnished to the Quartermaster General by said board, and the specific parts thereof adopted as the basis of examination shall be promulgated to the volunteer militia by the commander in chief in such manner as to indicate the exact scope or standard required of candidates in each respective grade or staff position, and the Quartermaster General shall furnish upon requisition to officers accountable for public property, copies of such books for the use of such officers and of those belonging to their commands. At such written examinations every officer shall also make, upon a prepared form, answers showing his military service and experience and his residence and occupation. Any other questions which the board or any member thereof may desire to ask shall be fully written out and the answers thereto shall be in writing. The board may make other inquiry relative to the officer ordered before it for examination, but such inquiry and the answer thereto shall in all cases be in writing, and all communications from and to the board shall be a part of the record and shall be preserved upon its files. Neither the board nor any member thereof shall make any inquiry or receive any communication, oral or written, relative to an officer before it, or who is to come before it, as to any matter affecting his qualifications as an officer in the militia except as above authorized.

"SEC. 69. The secretary of the board shall preserve all examinations, reports, and papers, and the findings of the board in the case of each officer; and the same shall, upon the demand of the commander in chief, be laid before him.

"SEC. 70. The provisions of the preceding nine sections shall, so far as they are applicable, apply also to any special board convoked by order of the commander in chief for examination of officers.

"SEC. 71. An officer who has passed his examination and has been assigned to duty shall not thereafter be ordered before the board of examiners while acting under the same commission; but said board may pass a candidate conditionally and order him to appear for further examination within 90 days after the date of his first examination, and an officer so conditionally passed who fails to appear before the board within the time designated, and does not furnish satisfactory explanation of his absence, or who then fails to pass a satisfactory examination, shall be discharged by the commander in chief.

"SEC. 72. An officer who in the opinion of his commanding officer is incompetent, or is impairing the efficiency of the organization to which he is attached, by mismanagement, neglect, or misconduct in civil life for which he is not amenable to court-martial, may, upon the request of his commanding officer, be ordered to appear before a special board of examiners, consisting of not less than three nor more than seven officers, none of whom shall be of lower rank than the officer under investigation. The members of such board may, for cause, be challenged by the accused as provided by the regulations as to courts-martial, and vacancies thus created shall be filled in the manner prescribed for military boards. Said board shall without delay inquire into the charges preferred against the accused, and may examine him, as provided in section 63, as to his mental and military qualifications; but the accused may produce any competent evidence, by witnesses or otherwise, and may be represented by counsel. The president of such board may administer oaths to witnesses, and may issue summonses as provided in section 185; and officers or soldiers failing to serve such summons, or failing to appear when so summoned without a sufficient excuse, shall be liable to trial by court-martial as for disobedience of orders, or may, as well as other witnesses failing to appear, be compelled to appear, as provided by section 10 of chapter 175 of the Revised Laws. Such board may, with the approval of the commander in chief, require a judge advocate to attend its sittings, when taking testimony or investigating any complaint. It shall report the facts, with the evidence and its recommendations, to the commander in chief, who may, if the board so recommends, discharge such officer. An officer failing to appear, as ordered, before such special board shall be discharged by the commander in chief."

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 17, 1910.

SIR: The following concerning the constitution of the personnel of the Naval Militia is recommended to all organizations now in existence or that may hereafter be formed:

Since the plan of organization varies in the different States, and since any efforts toward uniformity must proceed by easy stages, the recommendations contained herein involve no changes in present organization; that is, where the organization consists of companies or divisions, line or engineer, or is modeled on the complement of a ship's company, these may remain as at present. The desideratum is that the total force shall contain men in the different ratings and callings—"deck," "engineer," "electrical," "mechanical," and "miscellaneous"—about in the proportion as a modern ship's complement. In other words, the total force, or a division or company, shall contain all branches of the service, just as the landing force from a ship has in its ranks all such branches. With such an organization any Naval Militia force is ready to man a ship in its entirety or fill vacancies in all ratings on a ship of the Navy.

The Naval Militia organizations began as essentially military organizations; the training was in armories, supplemented by work in relatively small boats. For this purpose the military organization was a natural and a good one. With the progress that followed the Spanish War, when vessels of small size—converted yachts, etc.—were available for loan to the Naval Militia, the conditions materially changed. The training is now becoming essentially naval. Vessels of large size—gunboats, small cruisers, and coast defense—are being assigned the militia. It is only necessary to cite the Marblehead, Nashville, Isla de Cuba, Isla de Luzon, Yantic, etc. The vessels should be manned by the Naval Militia as they would be by the Navy. The training should be such that on a sudden call to war the vessel should be able to proceed at once with a complete complement.

There are given below the complements of several types of vessels, showing about the relative proportion of the several more numerous branches:

Class of ship.	Deck force.	Engineer force.	Electrical force.	Total complement.
Battleship (Connecticut)	461	240	30	834
Cruiser (New York)	221	155	12	447
Cruiser (Chicago)	196	119	8	377
Gunboat (Marblehead)	121	77	4	239
Gunboat (Nashville)	84	47	6	169
Monitor (Ozark)	113	53	10	209

Organizations on this basis will be able to train completely on a vessel that they can man on telegraphic notice. It is therefore earnestly recommended that the States take up the matter along these lines and submit their organization in requesting the loan of a vessel.

While it is desired to approach as near as possible the above-mentioned proportions, it is desired to call attention to the fact that localities differ as to their resources in materials, and each should develop to the highest degree such facilities as its locality offers. In any case, the need in time of war or of peace of skilled men—engineers, electricians, telegraphers, wireless operators, and mechanics of all branches—is so great that it is recommended that the personnel be recruited in those branches at the expense of the seamen branch.

Respectfully,

BEEKMAN WINTHROP,
Assistant Secretary.

EXHIBIT D.

[Circular letter No. 2.]

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 17, 1910.

SIR: 1. The summer exercises of the Naval Militia organizations on the Atlantic coast for the season 1910 will take place July 24 to 31, inclusive, and this will require that the men of each organization obtain leave for at least the period July 23 to August 1, inclusive. The rendezvous will be at Gardiners Bay, Long Island, and the cruise will be in that vicinity, visiting such ports as may be practicable, the vessels to disband in time to permit each visiting some large city for liberty.

2. The exercises of the organizations on the Great Lakes will take place August 8 to 17, inclusive, and this will require that the men of each organization obtain sufficient additional leave to enable them to arrive at the place of rendezvous prior to and leave after the completion of the cruise on the dates shown above. The rendezvous will be at Thunder Bay (Alpena), Mich., and the cruise will be down the Lakes to Buffalo, N. Y. It has been calculated that the cruise from Thunder Bay to Buffalo and return, maintaining a steady speed, will require about six days; therefore the necessity for 10 days, as outlined above, is apparent, as this period will allow 4 days for liberty, anchorages, and drills. Any less period than this will necessitate entirely remodeling the cruise, and it is requested that, if possible, the organizations make provision for this amount of time.

3. The following applies to the exercises of both the lake and the Atlantic coast organizations, as provided for in the preceding paragraphs:

Target practice will not be held during these exercises, but special circulars will be issued later on the subject. The exercises will consist of as much cruising, day and night, as is practicable, carrying on drills, signals, etc., the entire time. It is important that all line officers become as familiar as possible with Rules of the Road and all signal and cruising lights used in the Navy. To this end it is suggested that advantage be taken during the winter and spring of all opportunities offered by the Hydrographic Office to learn chart and compass work.

4. It is believed that keeping position "in formations" can be vastly improved if early attention is given to the following three points:

(a) Provide voice tubes, telephones, or some mechanical apparatus between the bridge and the engine room. (A report on the apparatus, if any, now installed, with recommendations for improvements, is requested at an early date. The department believes it is quite within the capacity of the Naval Militia and the ship keepers to install such apparatus.)

(b) Standardize the ship's propellers. (The department earnestly recommends that each organization proceed as soon as navigation permits to standardize the ship's propellers. Where there is no current, three runs over a carefully measured distance between landmarks that are perfectly located on the chart, noting accurately the time and counting the revolutions, will determine the revolutions per minute corresponding to a given speed. These experiments should be made for at least three speeds—one-half, three-quarters, and full speed—and a curve plotted for all speeds. The data, when obtained, should be forwarded immediately to the department.)

(c) Compasses to be carefully compensated and deviation tables prepared.

5. In view of this early notice the department will be gratified if the organizations cruising in their own vessels can arrange for a period of exercises of not less than 10 days together; that is, 10 days from the time of arriving at the place of rendezvous to the time the squadron disbands. The exercises aboard the battle ships will be for a period of eight days, exclusive of the time required to proceed to and return from the battle ships.

6. It is particularly desired that the attendance on the part of the Naval Militia be up to the full capacity of the vessels taking part.

7. A detailed itinerary for each of the lake and Atlantic coast exercises will be published later, so that necessary arrangements can be made for the sending and receiving of mail.

CRUISES OF INDIVIDUAL VESSELS OF ISOLATED ORGANIZATIONS—CALIFORNIA, LOUISIANA, NORTH CAROLINA, AND MISSOURI.

8. The department desires that the summer exercises of the Naval Militia of the States of California, Louisiana, North Carolina, and Missouri may be this year as complete and exhaustive as possible, and that practically every member of each organization shall take part.

9. As regards California, the Marblehead will take only a portion of the total strength of that organization. The excess over the complement of the Marblehead will be assigned to the Pacific Fleet, the necessary instructions in connection with such assignment to be made later. It is believed that by thus alternating the officers and men between the ships of the Navy and their own cruising vessel a progressive training will be established and the best results obtained.

10. The department selects the date July 17 to 24, inclusive, as the period for embarking the California organization on the vessels of the Pacific Fleet, and recommends that the cruise of the Marblehead take place at the same time. The above-mentioned period for instruction will require that the men of the organization obtain leave for at least the period July 16 to 25, inclusive.

11. As regards the organizations of Louisiana, North Carolina, and Missouri, it is not practicable for the vessels assigned to these States to take part in any combined exercises, and as there are not as yet any funds available for their transportation to and from the battleship fleet the department outlines the following suggestions:

(a) That each organization be recruited up to its allowed strength along the lines given in department's Circular Letter No. 1, of January 17, 1910.

(b) That the total force of each organization be divided into sections equal to the capacity of the cruising vessel.

(c) That arrangements be made for as many cruises of not less than seven days' duration as there are sections provided for by paragraph (b) above.

12. As a preparation for this cruising, it is important that the line officers become as familiar as possible with the Rules of the Road, anchoring, getting under way, etc., and should particularly take advantage of all opportunities offered by the hydrographic officer for instruction in chart and compass work.

13. The department leaves to each organization (Louisiana, North Carolina, and Missouri) the selection of the date for its exercises, but requests that an early decision may be arrived at and the entire organization so informed, that the maximum number of men may be able to secure the necessary leave from their vocations in order that they may take part.

14. The department recommends that each cruise of all individual vessels be continuous for the period allowed, not returning to the home port until the completion of each cruise, in order that the officers and men may get the maximum experience in navigating, anchoring, getting under way, etc., and become as familiar with the local waters as time will allow.

15. A naval officer will be detailed, if practicable, to accompany each vessel as adviser, and this applies to the exercises of the Atlantic coast, Great Lakes, and of individual vessels. In the meanwhile the naval recruiting officer in the port of each organization, if such an officer is available, will lend all assistance in his power in perfecting the plans as outlined above.

16. It is earnestly requested that the organizations of California, Louisiana, North Carolina, and Missouri submit to the department at as early a date as possible the tentative plans of the organization, including date set for cruises, in the matter of summer exercises, and the department will hold itself in readiness to render such assistance as is in its power.

EXERCISES ON THE BATTLESHIPS.

17. As the vessels assigned to the States on the Atlantic coast will accommodate but a portion of the total force of the respective organizations, those in excess of the complement of the State vessel will be sent to the Atlantic Battleship Fleet under arrangements similar to those of the exercises of 1909. In this connection the department at a later date will require a statement from each organization of the number of officers and men in the several ranks and ratings who will require assignment to the battleship fleet. Details as to the mode of transportation to and from the battleships can not be given at this date, as it may be dependent on legislative action. Such organizations as took part in the battleship fleet exercises of 1909 are familiar with the details. Bags and hammocks are required, but not mess gear.

18. For such organizations having no vessels, where the States have funds available for the pay, subsistence, and transportation of their men to and from points to be fixed by the department for the embarkation on transports, battleships, or other vessels, the question of assigning the men of those organizations to vessels for instruction will be given consideration.

19. With all the above arrangements strictly carried out, and the early knowledge by all members of the organization of the dates set for its exercises, whether combined or individual, the attendance should approach the total organized strength of each Naval Militia organization.

Respectfully,

BEEKMAN WINTHROP,
Assistant Secretary.

UNITED STATES NAVAL MILITIA, 1887–1907.

"An examination of the Naval Militia movement shows that it has grown out of an endeavor to create a force of men and ships to be available for reenforcing the Regular Navy on demand.

"Mr. Whitthorne introduced Senate bill 3320, February 17, 1887, 'To create a naval reserve of auxiliary cruisers, officers, and men from the mercantile marine of the United States.' The measure did not become a law. The Navy Department, in 1887, prepared a plan of organization for a Naval Militia.

"Mr. Whitthorne introduced, January 4, 1888, H. R. 1847, and substituted, June 26, 1888, H. R. 10622, 'To provide for the enrollment of Naval Militia and the organization of naval forces, etc.' This bill did not become a law, but it was the basis of State action in several States.

"On October 1, 1891, California, Massachusetts, New York, North Carolina, Rhode Island, and Texas reported an enrolled Naval Militia of 1,149 men and officers. These forces were parts of the National Guard or Volunteer Militia of their States.

"In 1892 Texas had dropped out and South Carolina came in. The total enrolled Naval Militia was 1,794. The organizations of four States were drilled on seagoing men-of-war in the Navy.

"In 1893 the force reported from nine States was 2,376. The Naval Militia of five States drilled on naval vessels.

"In 1894 11 States reported 2,539 men, exclusive of officers. The Naval Militia of six States was drilled on naval vessels.

"In 1895 13 States reported 2,695 men, exclusive of officers. Most of the battalions went into camp. The Naval Militia of four States was drilled on naval vessels. One State's force made a boat reconnoissance and survey.

"In 1896 14 States reported 3,339 men, exclusive of officers. Most of the organizations were drilled on naval vessels. Some went into camp.

"In 1897 15 States reported 3,703 men. The Naval Militia of 12 States was drilled on naval vessels and with torpedo boats. Target practice, mainly with subcaliber guns, was given. A memorandum for the probable field of operations was prepared from the views of the Naval War College and reports of boards of inspections.

"This memorandum included—

"1. Manning a flotilla for defense of interior waters.

"2. Protection of harbors by mines and improvised batteries.

"3. Maintenance of signal stations and a system of scouting.

"In 1898, prior to the outbreak of hostilities of the Spanish-American War, it was found necessary to make a large increase in the enlisted force of the Navy.

"The only additional trained men available were the officers and men of the Naval Militia of the several States, which, under appropriations from Congress, had been armed, equipped, and given training in the line of defense of the coasts and harbors. In the absence of authority for calling these men into service the governors of these States patriotically granted them leaves of absences or permitted them to resign from the Naval Militia in order to enlist in the Navy.

"During the war about 4,000 officers and men were added to the Navy in this manner and were assigned to duty in the auxiliary naval forces, the coast signal service, and especially on cruising ships, of which the Yankee, Dixie, Prairie, and Yosemite were entirely officered and manned by them, with the exception of the commanding, executive, and navigating officers.

"These organizations were largely recruited outside of the seagoing class, and lacked the experience in gunnery, navigation, and habits of the sea necessary to immediate high efficiency in the Navy. On the other hand, they were men of a high standard of education and intelligence and rapidly acquired while on shipboard the necessary knowledge. The country has been amply repaid for the money expended in their instruction and training.

"The auxiliary naval force was authorized by resolution approved May 26, 1898, for coast defense. The personnel of the force was almost entirely contributed by the Naval Militia organizations of the several States. A small percentage was supplied by the merchant marine. Ten monitors were put in commission and officered and manned by the Naval Militia. Many of those vessels cruised from port to port and went to sea for target practice, which gave the officers and men valuable training. This service afforded a sense of protection to the people along our Atlantic coast line. Ten yachts and 5 tugs were purchased. At its maximum strength the auxiliary naval force included 41 vessels in commission.

"The duty of protecting mine fields and of maintaining quarantine regulations was performed by a fleet of 8 converted yachts, 10 converted tugs, and 1 side-wheel steamer, all officered and manned by men from the Naval Militia, and by 4 revenue cutters, with their regular officers and crews, which were stationed on the Pacific coast.

"The Atlantic coast line was divided into eight districts, in which were distributed 36 signal stations, officered and manned entirely by the State Naval Militia. This signal service extended along our coasts from Maine to Texas.

"Eight hundred and fifty-six volunteer officers served in the Navy in the Spanish-American War. A large proportion of them were officers of the Naval Militia. Secretary of the Navy John D. Long states:

"'The zeal and attention to duty of these volunteer officers were of a high order.'

"The experience of the Spanish-American War demonstrated the necessity of a national naval-reserve force to be subject to the call of the National Government in time of war. This war also demonstrated the fitness and efficiency of the Naval Militia to perform every duty that has been demanded of it.

"In 1899 the Naval Militia of 16 States was drilled under the supervision of regular Navy officers on men-of-war, and the enlisted men numbered 6,302.

"In 1900 nine militia forces were drilled on naval vessels, and the number of men dropped to 5,309. Five States had the use of vessels lent by the department under the provisions of the act approved August 3, 1894.

"In 1901 six States' militia were drilled under the direction of naval officers, and the number of enrolled men dropped to 4,679. The drills conducted by the militia officers were increased in number and improved in quality.

"From 1901 to 1906 the routine of drills has continued; the number of enrolled men has averaged 4,808.

"Several States have expended appropriations directly for their Naval Militia, and there is a tendency to distinguish between Naval Militia and National Guard plainly shown in State legislation.

"It is reported by inspecting officers of the Navy that the Naval Militia is lacking in proper facilities to secure the best results in drill and instruction.

"The Secretary of the Navy, by order dated October 21, 1905, has placed the Naval Militia under the Assistant Secretary. The allotments to the State militia of the funds appropriated by Congress are directed by him and are proportional to the number of enlisted men. The allotments are expended or disbursed by the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, and arms, equipment, etc., are issued by the Bureau of Ordnance.

"There is annexed a table showing the naval vessels lent to the militia of the various States and the District of Columbia.

"The Puritan, of the District Naval Militia, is the only vessel with a modern battery used by the militia.

"The annexed tabulation of enlisted men of the militia shows the number enrolled for every year from 1891 to 1906, both years included. On same sheet is given the annual appropriations by Congress for arming and equipping the Naval Militia. The total is $705,000 to date. The number of commissioned officers is about 10 per cent of the enlisted force.

"Louisiana: The Naval Militia of this State furnished a total of 19 officers and 214 enlisted men to the Navy. In addition to this number about 200 men were recruited by the State authorities after the outbreak of hostilities, but were not taken into the regular service, enlistment in which had been stopped. Of the above number supplied to the service, 10 officers and 94 enlisted men were detailed to the U. S. S. Passaic, 7 officers and 97 men to the United States auxiliary naval force and at the Pensacola Navy Yard, and 2 officers and 23 men to the coast signal service. Of this detail to the Pensacola Navy Yard, 35 were sent to the receiving ship Lancaster at Key West and afterwards distributed to the ships of the North Atlantic Fleet.

"In addition to the above naval militiamen, 6 of the Louisiana battalion served in the Revenue-Marine Service; 20 served on Army transports, and 25 served in the various volunteer regiments recruited in the State of Louisiana; 3 enlisted in the Fifth United States Cavalry; 2 in the Eighteenth United States Infantry; and 2 in the Volunteer Artillery. These latter were men who failed to get into the naval service, but were anxious to serve their country in any capacity.

"Maryland: The Naval Militia of this State at the outbreak of the war consisted of 20 officers and 320 men, and its commanding officer was authorized by the governor to increase this number as occasion demanded. The total mustered into the United States naval service was 24 officers and 425 petty officers and enlisted men who were assigned as follows:

"Massachusetts: The Naval Militia of this State supplied 38 officers and 384 men to the naval service. Of this number, 7 officers and 138 men served on the U. S. S. Prairie; 20 officers and 246 men served on the auxiliary naval force vessels Minnesota, Lehigh, Catskill, Governor Russell, East Boston, Wyandotte, Inca, and Seminole; and 2 officers and 36 men served in the coast signal service.

"After the outbreak of hostilities this organization was increased, in accordance with an act of the Legislature of Massachusetts, by four divisions, each containing 3 officers and 55 men.

"Michigan: The Naval Militia of this State, which, at the beginning of the war, consisted of 18 officers and 175 men, furnished 11 officers and 270 men to the naval service, all of whom served on the U. S. S. Yosemite, many of this number having joined the organization after the commencement of hostilities.

"New Jersey: The Naval Militia of this State furnished 34 officers and 373 men to the naval service. Of this number, 20 officers and 261 petty officers and men served on the U. S. S. Badger and U. S. S. Resolute; 9 officers and 74 petty officers and men in the auxiliary naval force on the U. S. S. Montauk; and 1 officer and 19 petty officers and men in the coast signal service.

"New York: The Naval Militia of the State of New York furnished 49 officers and 805 petty officers and men to the United States naval service. The following statement will show, in detail, the disposal of this force:

"North Carolina: The Naval Militia of this State furnished 9 officers and 189 men to the naval service.

"Pennsylvania: The Naval Militia of this State at the outbreak of the war consisted of 19 officers and 252 petty officers and men.

"Fifteen commissioned officers and 84 petty officers and men were mustered into the naval service. Two men from the ranks passed as officers and are included in the 15, but are not included in the 19.

"The reason why such a small number of men entered the service was that the Government stopped enlisting after two of the three divisions only had been examined, thus reducing the total examined by 4 commissioned officers and 84 petty officers and men. Two of the Philadelphia officers were unable to answer the call.

"Out of the two Philadelphia divisions examined, 49 were rejected physically, 21 were rejected because of under age, and the difference of 14 men did not report for examination.

"Those mustered into the service were as follows:

"One officer to command auxiliary naval force, fourth district.
"One officer to command U. S. R. S. St. Louis.
"One officer to command the U. S. S. Aileen.
"One officer to command the U. S. S. Minneapolis.
"Two officers to command the U. S. S. Viking.
"Six officers and 58 men to the U. S. S. Arctic.
"Two officers to the U. S. S. Huntress.
"One officer to the U. S. S. Sylph.
"Twenty-one men to the coast signal service.

"Rhode Island: The Naval Militia organization of this State consisted of 15 officers and 159 men at the outbreak of hostilities, of which number 8 officers and 147 men were mustered into the naval service, not including the commanding officer, who, being on the retired list of the Navy, was ordered to duty.

"South Carolina: At the outbreak of the war the Naval Militia of this State consisted of 21 officers and 302 men, which force was increased by 102 volunteers within 10 days after hostilities commenced. Of this number, 18 officers, 6 mates, and 187 enlisted men were mustered into the naval service and were distributed as follows:

"In addition to the above, this organization furnished 16 men to the United States Volunteer Army. The remaining 198 men were not called out, but remained ready to serve at any time.

"Virginia: The Naval Militia of this State furnished 2 officers and 62 men to the Navy, of which number 48 men were enlisted in the regular service and 2 officers and 11 men did duty in the coast signal service.

"Although these organizations, many of whose members were recruited outside the seafaring class, failed to fully meet the requirements of the case, they were all upon which the General Government had to draw at the beginning of the war. A majority of these, through cooperation on the part of the governors of their States, answered the call of the Government and were mustered into the service for duty on cruising ships in the United States auxiliary naval force and in the coast signal service. The Navy Department was hampered in its efforts at rapid mobilization by its lack of Federal jurisdiction over these organizations, but in the end succeeded in obtaining a force of over 4,000 officers and men.

"Too much can not be said of the patriotism displayed by a majority of the members of these organizations, many of whom, although they had never been to sea before the mast, knew that they were to face not only the dangers of war, but hardships to which they had never been accustomed.

"Of a total force of 24,123 enlisted men employed in the Navy during this war, 4,216 were mustered in from Naval Militia organizations, of which number about 2,600 served in the Regular Navy, the remainder in the auxiliary naval force and coast signal service. As a rule, they had not been sufficiently trained in a practical knowledge of the modern implements of war, of the ship's organization, and the requirements of a sea life to make them of much actual value for some time after joining a vessel; but, possessing a high average of education and intelligence, they picked up their duties quickly, especially in those cases where they were surrounded by trained man-of-war's men, and when the war ended were becoming quite efficient in their various grades and rates."

On request from the Naval Militia of the various States, and also on the department's initiative, various articles of ship equipment and supplies are furnished the organizations, charging cost against appropriation "Arming and equipping Naval Militia." (In connection with the equipment, see Substatement B, attached.)

In cases where the department has not considered an article of equipment, when requested by a State, as absolutely necessary, yet possibly desirable, for a vessel on Naval Militia duty, or when the articles requested are in excess of a suitable allowance for such a vessel, charge has been made against appropriation "Arming and equipping Naval Militia."

An idea of the character of the material furnished under this appropriation may be obtained from the following:

Arms: Rifles, revolvers, bayonets, cartridge belts, and subtarget guns.

Ammunition: For small arms and larger guns; saluting and target.

Clothing: Navy uniforms, both dress and working.

Fuel: Coal for larger vessels and for steam cutters; gasoline for power boats. This item is one that quickly exhausts a State allotment when any considerable amount of cruising is done by an organization having a large vessel.

At times it has happened that during the latter part of a fiscal year a bureau appropriation has become greatly depleted through work on vessels of the regular service, in which case charges for repairs to vessels assigned to Naval Militia duty have been made against the Naval Militia appropriation

Tools and supplies for vessels: Engine room and other ship department tools and consumable supplies are furnished under this appropriation. Many of these articles are required by the various Naval Militia for use on the vessels assigned to them, and such material very materially reduces a State's allotment, and frequently entirely eliminates an allotment before the new appropriation becomes available.

Books of instruction: Printing of blank forms for use by the Naval Militia in submitting reports, requisitions, etc., to the department as required; the printing of instruction pamphlets and books for distribution among the Naval Militia.

Care and maintenance of small boats: This takes into consideration the dingeys, cutters, whaleboats, steam cutters, and gasoline boats which are loaned to Naval Militia organizations separate and distinct from the regular boat equipment of larger vessels; repairs to and overhauling of these boats; furnishing same with boat covers, sails, rowlocks, oars, gas engines, steam whistles for, etc., when required to replace worn-out or lost articles, or when in excess of the original allowance of such articles; also the renting of mooring buoys, winter storage quarters for small boats, the hauling of such boats to and from storage, and the launching of same.

Purchase of mess tables and benches, etc.

Hire of mess gear.

Furnishing of flags and signal outfits, including combination running lights, when not part of a ship's outfit.

Mattresses, hammocks, blankets, bunting, manila rope.

Hose (cotton). Binoculars.

Navigating instruments, including binnacles.

Speed cones. Mooring lines, etc.

On the assignment of a vessel by the department to Naval Militia duty steps are taken to place aboard the necessary equipment, taking into consideration this special duty, and also four months' supplies, with sufficient fuel to take her to her Naval Militia home port. When such equipment and supplies are placed aboard a vessel so assigned, entry is made on the books of the department and on those of the general storekeeper at the yard at which the vessel is being fitted out, charging the cost of same to the several appropriations of the bureaus of the Navy Department, Title "O" (Naval Militia).

After a vessel has been turned over to a State, and it is found that additional articles of equipment are necessary to meet the requirements of the vessel under her particular special duty, such equipment is furnished and proper entry made on the books of the department, as stated above.

Quite a few States have not sufficient strength in their Naval Militia to warrant their asking for the loan of a vessel. To these States small boats, such as cutters, whaleboats, steam cutters, etc., are assigned as loans. Small-boat equipment is charged in the same manner as for large-boat equipment, as stated above, except that when replaced with new articles or when in excess of allowance the cost is charged against the appropriation "Arming and equipping Naval Militia." There are small boats, not portions of a ship's regular equipment, in the hands of a number of the States in addition to the ships which they have.

Worn-out or lost articles of equipage of a ship, when condition is shown not to be the entire fault of the Naval Militia through neglect or indifference, are replaced on charge against the bureau appropriations and not the Naval Militia appropriations.

The department has issued as loans to Naval Militia organizations for installation in their armories various detached articles of ship equipment to be used in necessary instruction in connection therewith. Signal outfits have been loaned when available and also 4-inch guns.

All articles of ship equipment, whether on a ship or installed in an armory, are issued as loans and are subject to recall at the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy.

Paint material is considered by the department as necessary in frequently touching up portions of the ships to prevent undue deterioration and to keep them at all times in condition for immediate service in the regular service, should occasion arise at any time requiring the department to recall one or more vessels from the special duty with the Naval Militia. For this reason paint material has been furnished to Naval Militia vessels on requisition submitted by the governor of a State, charge for which is made against the several appropriations of the bureaus of the Navy Department (Title "O") and not against appropriation "Arming and equipping Naval Militia," except for the care and preservation of small boats not attached to a ship as part of her equipment, in which case paint is charged against the latter appropriation.

When clearly shown by the Naval Militia that other material requested is to be used aboard the vessels to prevent undue deterioration in the same manner as paint materials, the department has furnished such material without charge to the appropriation "Arming and equipping Naval Militia," but has charged the cost of same against the bureau appropriations, as in the case of paint materials.

It will be seen that the major part of the expenditures under Title "O" (Naval Militia) covers charges for articles of equipment which are returnable to the department, and for this reason does not represent an expenditure on Naval Militia. These articles are at all times the property of the Navy Department and are subject to recall at the request of the department.

Officers and men of the Naval Militia have been drilled on board battleships, cruisers, and other vessels, and the reports from captains are most encouraging as to the zeal, intelligence, and bearing of the organizations. Similarly the reports of the Naval Militia officers are to the effect that the opportunities thus offered for training are of the greatest value. This plan will probably always form a part of the summer exercises.

Certain vessels are assigned to States where they are unable to form part of any combined exercises, and therefore make individual cruises. These vessels are generally accompanied by a naval officer detailed by the Navy Department, who acts as advisor and reports on the cruise.

In addition to the annual cruise vessels assigned to the Naval Militia engage in short cruises as the opportunity offers.

PROSPECTIVE PLANS OF THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Working along the lines that have developed from the above exercises, and especially with the idea of establishing a system of progressive training, the department has directed the issue of a 4-inch and a subtarget gun to each armory of the Naval Militia and two 4-inch or 6-pounder guns to each Naval Militia vessel. Detailed instructions of the training of gun pointers are being printed, and systematic target practice will be held. This will develop the ordnance question thoroughly. Similarly, signal flags and codes are issued, and wireless telegraphy will be added. This will develop expert signalmen. The books now being issued are the latest of the instruction books used by the Navy. The department is able to report much progress and interest being taken by the Naval Militia.

The equipping of new organizations, the new departure in the essential matter of target practice, the increased steaming by the Naval Militia vessels involve more expense. But these expenditures are so essentially in the line of increased professional efficiency that it is believed the results will justify the expense.

It is estimated by the Navy Department that if this bill becomes a law the Organized Militia will rapidly grow to the strength of at least 10,000 efficient men capable of being on board ship in fighting trim on short notice. The benefit that would result, therefore, can scarcely be overestimated, in view of the fact that during the Spanish War it took six weeks to recruit 5,000 men in the regular naval service, a majority of whom were untrained, to a great extent, in naval warfare.

The committee therefore recommend that the bill as amended do pass.

GEORGE EDWARD LERRIGO.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3419) admitting to citizenship and fully naturalizing George Edward Lerrigo, of the city of Topeka, in the State of Kansas. It is a matter of considerable importance. Mr. Lerrigo is now representing the Young Men's Christian Association in China, and he has no country behind him.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator one question. Was the bill a unanimous report from the Committee on Immigration?

Mr. THOMPSON. It was.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. As chairman of the committee I would like to state that it is a unanimous report. All objections to the bill were withdrawn.

Mr. LODGE. It is a very proper case, and the bill ought to pass. I happen to know something about it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that George Edward Lerrigo, the son of an American citizen, of the city of Topeka, in Shawnee County, State of Kansas, shall be admitted and declared to be a citizen of the United States of America and is fully naturalized as such citizen for all purposes from and after the taking effect of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPUBLIC COAL CO., OF MONTANA.

Mr. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Let the joint resolution be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, empowered, and directed to sell to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of and doing business in the State of Montana, the coal deposits in and under the following described lands, situate in Musselshell County, State of Montana, to wit: Section 30, township 8 north, range 26 east; section 6, township 7 north, range 26 east; northeast quarter southeast quarter and southeast quarter northeast quarter and west half of southwest quarter section 26, township 8 north, range 25 east. In the event of a sale the purchase price thereof shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, and upon payment thereof the said Secretary shall issue to said corporation a contract providing the terms and conditions of said sale: Provided, however, That said sale shall be made subject to the legal or equitable rights, inchoate or vested, of any surface or other entryman on any part of said lands, and subject to the laws now in force governing the sales of coal or other minerals where the surface lands and rights are reserved or have been previously disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] has some amendments to offer, and while he is getting them ready I will make a few remarks on the joint resolution. I will be very brief.

The joint resolution simply proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to sell three or four sections of coal land in Montana to the Republic Coal Co., to sell at a price to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, and at not less than the appraised value. He can not sell the land for less than the appraised value, but may put it at as much higher price as he may see fit.

The Republic Coal Co. is engaged in furnishing its entire output of coal to the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, a transcontinental railroad which crosses the State of Montana. That railroad depends upon this coal company entirely to get its supply of coal for its route through a great part of Montana and North Dakota. It is the only feasible place for obtaining a supply of coal. This company does not enter into competition with commercial coal dealers or companies nor sell to the public, but its entire output is furnished to this railroad. The railroad takes all that it produces; it must have that and more, too.

The Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the Director of the Geological Survey have all very heartily and unqualifiedly indorsed the joint resolution as a public necessity. The Interstate Commerce Commission was communicated with and asked whether or not there was any other feasible, adequate, and reasonable source for this transcontinental railroad to get its supply of coal for that part of its line in Montana and North Dakota, and it answered that there was no other feasible, adequate, or reasonable source of supply from which such coal could be obtained.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask whence other consumers of coal in that part of the country derive their supply?

Mr. MYERS. From operators in the same coal fields. The circumstances are, I will go on and state in this connection, that this company, the Republic Coal Co., has a couple of sections of land in the same community, which it originally purchased from the State of Montana and which it is mining. Those sections are now about mined out; they are about to the end of their supply. There is only coal enough under those lands to last a few months longer. They want to buy three or four adjoining sections of land that are owned by the United States Government. Each alternate section of land in that part of the country is owned by the Northern Pacific Railway Co., because it came within the grant of every alternate section within 50 miles on each side of that road. Being a competing line, it will not sell any of the coal, nor any of its lands to this coal company. It is impossible for it to effect a purchase of any coal or land from the Northern Pacific Railway Co. The other alternate sections are owned by the Government, and it is impossible for a corporation, railroad or otherwise, to locate those lands. If individuals locate them, and afterwards sell them to a railroad company or to any other corporation, it is held by the courts to be prima facie evidence of fraud, with a criminal penalty attached. So there is absolutely no way for this transcontinental railroad company to compete with rival lines and to get fuel for its road through that section of the country unless this coal-mining company, the Republic Coal Co., can buy, at a price to be fixed by the Government, to be not less than the appraised value, this small area of coal land.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish the Senator from Montana would state in his remarks that this joint resolution for the sale by the Government carries nothing of a fee-simple title; that it is simply for the sale of the coal.

Mr. MYERS. That is true. The joint resolution was recommended in committee to be so amended as to provide only for the sale of the coal under the land, and does not propose to sell any surface rights. According to the opinions of the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the Director of the Geological Survey, the passage of the joint resolution is an absolute necessity in the interest of the public.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, will he yield to me for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. MYERS. With great pleasure.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to ask the Senator if the lands contiguous to these sections are coal-bearing lands owned by private individuals?

Mr. MYERS. Some of them are.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What is the area of the coal-bearing lands privately owned there?

Mr. MYERS. I could not tell the Senator the definite number of acres.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Are those lands owned by private individuals or by the railroad company?

Mr. MYERS. Part of the land is owned by private individuals, part of it by the United States Government, and part of it by the Northern Pacific Railroad Co., a competing line.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Could not this railroad company, in order to make its purchases, buy these lands from private individuals, instead of, as you propose, the Government selling the lands to them?

Mr. MYERS. No; there is only a very small percentage of these lands owned by private individuals, and they are working them, getting out the coal, and selling it to the public.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Do they supply coal enough for the railroads?

Mr. MYERS. No. The individual supply there, the output, is not sufficient to furnish the needs of the railroad company.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Do I understand the Senator from Montana to say that the rival railroad declines to sell its coal lands?

Mr. MYERS. That is my understanding. This company has never been able to negotiate any purchase from nor deal with the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. for any of its coal lands.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it strikes me as a rather radical departure from our policy to pass a special act directing the sale of coal lands to a particular company, which is restricted in its operations to furnishing coal for a single customer, and making no provision for the other customers for coal in that region. There may be special reasons why it is important in this case, but my own prejudices are very much against selling the coal lands of the United States. I would much prefer to see them leased. It is possible that the committee in this case, by the amendment it has proposed restricting the transfer of the fee, has gone far enough; but I should much prefer to see a provision brought in here for the leasing of the coal lands.

Mr. MYERS. I will say at this juncture that the joint resolution as originally introduced provided for the sale or lease of this land, but the majority of the committee are unalterably opposed to leasing. Upon a vote of a majority of the committee, the leasing provision was stricken out.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask why the majority of the committee was opposed to leasing?

Mr. MYERS. I do not know.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Why does the majority of the committee insist on an absolute sale at a present estimated value if the company are willing to accept a leasing proposition?

Mr. MYERS. I can give one reason, which I remember was suggested in the committee, and that was that if there was a leasing arrangement the Government would have to keep agents there on the ground to keep track of the amount of the coal output and to ascertain the royalty; that it would lead to confusion and trouble, and would be liable to lead to fraud.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me ask the Senator, would not the books of the coal company and the books of the railroad company show beyond any dispute just exactly how many tons of coal were mined?

Mr. MYERS. Well, Mr. President, as to that I can only say that, as the author of the joint resolution, it was immaterial to me whether it provided for the sale or the leasing of this comparatively small area of coal lands. The majority of the Senate Committee on Public Lands decided to recommend in favor of a sale only.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator please state what is the area proposed to be sold?

Mr. MYERS. As provided in the joint resolution it is:

Section 30, township 8 north, range 26 east; section 6, township 7 north, range 26 east; northeast quarter southeast quarter and southeast quarter northeast quarter and west half of southwest quarter section 26, township 8 north, range 25 east.

Three sections in all, I believe.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In other words, something less than 2,000 acres.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Has unanimous consent been given for the present consideration of this measure?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understood.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I did not understand that unanimous consent had been given.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thought the joint resolution was read for the information of the Senate, but that the question as to unanimous consent for its consideration had not been put.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no reason, under the rule, of which the Chair knows, why an objection to its consideration could not be entered now.

Mr. NORRIS. I was going to suggest that, as I understand the rule, an objection could be made at any time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It can be; but I simply did not want the debate and argument to proceed unless unanimous consent had been obtained. It is a waste of time.

Mr. MYERS. Has not unanimous consent been granted for the consideration of this measure, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understood. The Chair inquired if there was objection, and heard none; but under the rules an objection may be now entered.

Mr. MYERS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Has not unanimous consent been granted for the consideration of the joint resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. MYERS. May it now be withdrawn?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks so, during the morning hour.

Mr. JONES. I desire to suggest, Mr. President, that when the unanimous-consent agreement was made yesterday, I think it was made with, at least, the general impression that when the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was disposed of, the agricultural extension bill should be taken up. I know the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] had the floor and was proceeding to address the Senate last evening. We have an agreement that at 2 o'clock we must take up the agricultural-extension bill under the 15-minute rule; so I hardly feel that I ought to consent to the further consideration of the pending measure if it is likely to take any considerable time. I do not like to object, but that is the situation.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I understood that the agricultural extension bill of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] was not to come up until 2 o'clock, and I supposed that we were in the midst of the morning hour until 2 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I find, Mr. President, that there are Senators who would like to speak at once upon the agricultural extension bill; and, if the Senator from Montana would consent to wait until Monday, I would appreciate his doing so.

Mr. MYERS. I want to be accommodating. This measure has been waiting a long time, and the Calendar has not been called for weeks. I inquire if objection has been made at this time, Mr. President?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that it will take some time to discuss the joint resolution and to allow amendments to be offered, and perhaps it would take longer than 2 o'clock to reach a vote upon it.

Mr. MYERS. Then I withdraw the request, Mr. President.

COOPERATIVE AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION WORK.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7951.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7951) to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I will conclude all that I wished to say on yesterday evening when interrupted by some other matters which intervened.

The care that we have on behalf of this amendment is that there shall be such necessary safeguards as will insure to all alike in every State of the Union to which funds shall be distributed a just proportion of the benefits. The irrelevant matter that came into the debate was perhaps unavoidable. Naturally, those who have this matter under consideration will try to judge of the fairness with which these funds would be distributed by recurring to other matters affecting a large portion of the population of certain States. Out of that anxiety undoubtedly the author of this amendment drew such provisions as would insure a just use of the money.

A large part of the land susceptible of cultivation in many of the Southern States and now in actual cultivation is handled under a system of tenant farming. The figures read by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] indicate the very great economic advance of the negro. In the aggregate the vast amount of property now held by the colored race shows that they will make progress, become self-sustaining, well informed, and able to discharge in the future such duties as may come to them.

The system of tenant farming is not a good system, although it is better than none. Tenant farming is on an increase alarmingly in many of the Central, Western, and Northern States. Probably it comes from an entirely different cause than is responsible for this condition in other sections. It springs in the States last mentioned, in the older States at least, from the high price of land and the inevitable tendency of the titles to drift from the small to the large holder. This puts several thousand acres of extremely valuable land in the hands of one owner. In many instances it is let out on the tenant-farming system, and in others it is farmed through a foreman, so that the owner has a direct interest in the result as well as in the farm. The better plan is always to encourage by every possible means the holding in severalty of small tracts, so that the man who works the soil and the owner of the freehold may be identical. Anything that will tend to increase this holding of smaller tracts of land, so that the tiller of the soil and the owner of the soil may be the same, ought to be encouraged. If there is anything that can be done by this Government to enable the negro who is now a tenant farmer to acquire title to the land he farms—a part of it at least, enough to give him an interest in the country and make him feel as though he had some stake in the future prosperity of the country—it ought to be done.

It is urged here very sincerely by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] that it would be a duplication of effort if two demonstrators in agricultural extension work were to go in a given locality and give instruction. I do not think that necessarily follows. Where there are two institutions in a State in which agricultural instruction is given the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] in substance provides that in a just way, after the facts are presented to the authority controlling, there shall be a division of the fund.

This anxiety I mentioned grows out of the fact that in former times there have been some rights, as we understand them, about which those of the Caucasian race in immediate contact with the negro have not been solicitous or at all times entirely just, from one viewpoint, in the preservation of those rights.

I do not want to raise at all, because I realize that it is somewhat irrelevant at this time, the question of occurrences of many years ago. I do not wish to discuss the question of political or social equality. Political equality is guaranteed by law. Social equality can not be guaranteed by law. No puny fiat of any human being can bring social equality. That is something that belongs to the personality of the race or races concerned. It can not be secured by any mere legislative enactment. Political equality can be.

It would serve no useful purpose to criticize any denial of political equality in the discussion of this bill. That properly belongs, at some other time or place, on some other measure that might be pending. We have only alluded to it here to show that in some of the States where money will go from the Federal Treasury under this bill, if it shall become a law, there is a substantial denial of participation in local government at least.

These are public funds, to be sent under the provisions of the bill to 48 States, or to so many of them as shall answer the requirements of the original bill. Sending these funds to those States is a governmental act. The money is drawn from every available source. Wherever the Government derives its public revenues, there the people who help pay those revenues are interested.

It would serve no useful purpose here to go into a comparative examination of the source from which these revenues are derived and what State or States contribute the greater amount of money to be handled under this appropriation. I only allude to political conditions here to show that the men who are tenant farmers in many of the States we have in mind are denied participation in public affairs. There is no self-government of that element of the population in those States. There being no self-government, no participation in their own government, by those people under existing conditions of local laws in their States, it seems to us that this amendment expresses a proper degree of care to secure for those people, thus denied local participation in affairs of a governmental character, a fair distribution of benefits in the expenditure of these funds that come from the General Government.

It is in that spirit that I approached this subject, and it is in that spirit that other matters that appear to be entirely irrelevant have been brought in. They have been brought in more than anything else to illustrate the necessity of this amendment if justice is to be done to this element of our population.

Having that in mind, we who favor this amendment think it ought to be adopted. We think it is a matter of justice; that it will lead to no waste of the public money; that it will guarantee in the terms of the act which provides the money that this part of our population shall have their share of the benefit. I do not go so far as to say that otherwise it would be denied in whole. I do believe, however, there would be a tendency to deny it in some places, in part, at least.

I wish to see the negroes of our country given an opportunity to have equal instruction with others, without any regard to a matter of grace or generosity on the part of the white people who are about them and who exercise governmental control.

If I could be entirely assured that this would be done, I should be satisfied. I am not assured of it. I am not satisfied. Consequently I wish if possible, as far as any effort of mine will tend to bring it about, to have the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington adopted.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have opposed this bill for reasons that I have already stated. I do not believe it will be materially beneficial to the farmers. I do not believe there are a dozen Members of this body who believe it will be. If the bill is to become a law, as it certainly will, I am particularly anxious that the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] shall be adopted. It seems to me to be exceedingly unjust that the very farmers, in the South particularly, who need education if anybody does are going to be practically excluded from the benefits of this bill if it passes as it has been presented to the Senate.

It is unjust for another reason. The apportionment of the money to be appropriated under the bill is controlled by the rural population of the several States. In making the computation, of course the colored residents of the Southern States are counted. While that is so, and we are voting money for the benefit of the whole rural population under those conditions, a very large proportion of them will not be recognized as entitled to participate in the benefits of the appropriation.

Of course, the colored farmer may receive some benefit from this appropriation. He may look through the fence and see the demonstrations that are made on the farm of the white man, if they do not drive him away; but I imagine no demonstrations will be made on the land of the colored farmer for his benefit.

I should have assumed that it was not the intention of the bill as it came before the Senate to exclude the colored man from its benefits if it had not been for what has been said on that subject by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]. Their statements have convinced me that that is the very purpose of leaving this matter to be determined by the legislatures of the several States, because Senators say—and I have no doubt in perfect good faith—that you can not educate the colored farmer; that he will not accept education along that line; that he is not qualified for and can not be made a scientific farmer. If that be so, Mr. President——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JAMES in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WORKS. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator means by his statement that the negro farmer can not be improved, if he means to say that I or the Senator from Georgia said that he could not be improved, that his intelligence could not be enhanced, he is doing us an injustice and he is mistaken. You can not educate anybody. You can give a man an opportunity so that he may educate himself, but you can not educate a man. You can not stick education on him. Education means the unfolding or the development of that which is in the individual. I maintain—and I think I know something about this question, because I live in a State where 59 per cent of the population is black—that the negro has been improved in this regard very greatly. He is not more faithful to himself, but he is more efficient if his work shall be done under the wise direction of the white man. You can not develop an idea, you can not discover a fact, you can not provide a method which unfolds the hidden resources of the soil in Mississippi or California or any other State without every citizen engaged in agriculture in those States being benefited by that discovery if he shall take advantage of the lesson taught.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am not disposed to enter into a discussion of the subject of education in its broader sense. Whether or not I am doing an injustice to the Senator from Georgia or the Senator from Mississippi will be determined by what they have said, which appears in the RECORD. If I have misunderstood it or misconstrued it, that will be the correction of what I have said. I have taken what they have said as practically a declaration that it would be folly to appropriate this money for the purpose of attempting to educate the negro farmer, and I think their language carries that meaning. For myself, I do not believe it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WORKS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not wish by my silence to give approval to the Senator's construction of what I have said. I will not take up his time. I believe the negro farmer will be greatly improved by the way in which we will use this fund, and I believe he is now being greatly helped by the way in which we are spending $50,000 a year of our State taxes in demonstration work.

Mr. WORKS. I am exceedingly glad to hear the Senators modify what I think they have already said on this subject. It was very clearly stated by the Senator from Georgia, as I remember, that practically the colleges were of no benefit to the colored man in the Southern States, because they would not accept the teachings of those colleges.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I know the Senator from California always means to be fair. He has not heard all I said on the subject.

Mr. WORKS. May I ask the Senator from Georgia if he did not say practically that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; what I said was that the agricultural and mechanical school was not doing in agriculture what we had desired, because the students who go to it insist upon taking the mechanical instruction; that we have not done a great deal for them in agriculture because they elect a trade in preference to an agricultural pursuit; that the negro who advances in education goes into a different line of work entirely, and does not stay on the farm.

That was what I said, and that was what I meant to be understood as saying.

Mr. WORKS. Then the Senator from Georgia has proved just what I was contending—the injustice of the intention to withhold this teaching, or the benefits of this bill, from the colored man who can be benefited by its provisions.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WORKS. I do.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Can the Senator from California point to a single State in the South, since he seems to be directing his attention that way, where there is any discrimination whatever between the races in the application or apportionment of the school fund? Can he point to a single State in the South where the money appropriated for school purposes is not distributed according to the population of the races?

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, that is entirely unnecessary. It has been demonstrated conclusively by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], by the figures he has produced here, that there has been the worst kind of discrimination as between the races.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In what State?

Mr. WORKS. In numbers of the States. The Senator from Washington has the figures. I do not know that the Senator from Alabama was here at the time they were stated.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I did not hear that.

Mr. WORKS. I will say to the Senator from Alabama that I have made no study of that matter myself.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to say that I do know something about the conditions in Alabama, and I do know that as between the races the school fund in Alabama is apportioned to the school children according to population. The negroes get just as much per capita of the school fund in Alabama as the white children get, and they do not pay 3 per cent of the taxes.

Mr. WORKS. I have no doubt that is true.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then there is no discrimination in that.

Mr. WORKS. I have no doubt that is true in relation to the grammar and high schools. I have heard no question raised as to such schools; but the figures furnished by the Senator from Washington relative to the agricultural schools show directly to the contrary, and that is the matter we are now discussing.

I have no knowledge that the colored people have been discriminated against in any of the Southern States, so far as the distribution of the common-school funds is concerned. I am talking about the agricultural schools, and the proposition that is presented here for extending the work of the agricultural schools in that respect. The figures show conclusively to my mind that there has been discrimination as against the colored man; and there is an attempt made, I am sure, by the provisions of this bill to carry that discrimination into the bill that is now before the Senate. It is that against which I am protesting.

I am not going to take up the time of the Senate in talking about it. As I said a while ago, the fact that that sort of discrimination is intended has been proved by what has been said by the Senators I have mentioned. It is not necessary to go further, because they themselves construe the provision of the bill that the amendment attempts to eliminate as having that very effect. They give their reasons for it—in good faith, I have no doubt—but I think it is unjust. I think that provision of the bill should be stricken out. The colored farmers ought to be put upon an equality with the white farmers with respect to the benefits to be received from this proposed legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES. Before we proceed to a vote, I wish to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, before a vote is taken on this amendment I feel that I should say, in justice to the negroes of my own State, that so far as the farming population is concerned their record is entirely different from that presented by the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]. In our State the colored population are among our most successful farmers. I remember distinctly a negro family that acquired 160 acres of fine land in the county in which I formerly lived. The father educated a family of children. One of the young men attended our State university and graduated with credit to himself, and was afterwards elected to a county office in his county and successfully performed his duties to the entire satisfaction of the people.

In another county, where a large delegation of negroes emigrating from Alabama and Mississippi many years ago had settled, I was interested a few years ago in visiting that county to learn that one of the best lawyers in the county was a colored man, and that he had been nominated and elected county attorney on the Democratic ticket. He filled the office with credit, and I have been informed that he has been reelected a time or two.

We have elected a negro as a State officer in Kansas and he acquitted himself creditably. One of the richest farmers in Kansas to-day is a negro living in Wyandotte County. He has developed his farm until he is known now as the "Potato King of the Kaw Valley."

I speak of these gentlemen to illustrate that in Kansas the negro is a creditable citizen. He is successful in business and he is worthy of the esteem and confidence of his fellow countrymen. They are successful in the professions and trades and in every line of industry have reflected honor upon their race.

So far as the race as a whole is concerned, I do not think we should expect that those who emerged from barbarism but a comparatively short time since should be advanced in the arts of civilization as far as the Anglo-Saxon, who has been developing his civilization at least 2,000 years. We should not compare the African race with the northern European races, because they have not had the same opportunity. You might as well say that because 2,500 years ago our Saxon ancestors were savage barbarians who were living in forests in a wild and uncivilized state and were inferior to the Latin races or the Semitic races, who had developed civilization centuries and centuries before our ancestors did, that we were of inferior origin. None of us would admit such a thing.

I think we should avoid, in dealing with the problems that confront us as a nation, the racial prejudices that seem to be inherent in the human family, and we should discuss the problems that relate to the races from a viewpoint free from any of the prejudices which naturally grow out of close racial relations.

I wanted to say these words before the vote is taken, because I felt it my duty to the negroes of the State which I in part represent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate only a very few minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Georgia will permit, the Chair will state that the Senate is now operating under a unanimous-consent agreement which provides—

> That after 2 o'clock on February 7 no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the bill or more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon any amendment.

The Senator from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] in its effect will provide that the demonstration work done in States where a large negro population is found shall for the negroes be done from the negro college and for the whites from the white college. That will be the practical operation of the amendment.

Mr. President and Senators, it would be unwise in any locality to have two colleges directing this work. If in any State more than one college directs it, then the territory of the State should be divided and the direction of a particular college should be exclusive in a particular part of the territory; otherwise you would have a duplication of work and confusion and you would not have an economic administration of the fund.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Washington would be a severe blow to the negroes of my State. I have explained to you that the negro agricultural and mechanical school, combining both mechanical work and agricultural, on account of the preference of the negroes who go to it has drifted almost entirely into mechanical work; that the teachers at that school are negroes and trained peculiarly for that kind of work, outside of the English course, but that the faculty of that school is not prepared to do advanced agricultural work.

The negro who advances in his studies does not go to the sciences. I do not know a negro chemist. I do not know a negro botanist. We put negro professors in the school in the interest of the race. We have done what we could to make it agricultural. There is not an agricultural and mechanical negro school in the South that could do advanced agricultural work.

Our State college of agriculture is officered by men the majority of whom were not raised in Georgia. I do not think that more than a fourth of them are native Georgians. We gathered them from all over the country on account of their skill and knowledge in the science of agriculture. They can analyze a soil. They can analyze a plant. They can tell you the plant food in a piece of soil. They can tell you the plant food that a particular plant lives on. They study plant diseases. They give a large part of their time not to teaching in the college, but to traveling all over the State. They are mastering the entire soils of the State, the entire plants of the State, and the foods required by the plants, and the defects of the soil. They are holding meetings all over the State and at those meetings the negroes come. They instruct the negroes as they furnish information to the white farmer. They are working all over the State with the grown farmers without regard to race. It is any farmer who has a trouble and will lay it before them who receives their help. It is any farmer who will listen to whom they furnish information.

Who is it best for the negro of Georgia to have conduct the extension work? The agricultural and mechanical school of the negroes—officered by men who are not competent to do it, who are not trained to do it, who are really doing a different line of work—or the 16 to 20 professors at the State college of agriculture, who are masters of the subject?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Howard University is a colored university in this city, but they have white professors there. Could not these colored schools employ some of the scientists whom the Senator mentions?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We have conceded to them at their own request their own color in the control of their schools. When I was chairman of the board of education in Atlanta, at the instance of a large number of our best negroes, I joined in the passage of a resolution that excluded the competition of the white teachers. I do not believe you would find at the Howard University here a real student of agriculture.

Mr. GALLINGER. No, Mr. President; I did not make that point. The point I make was that they employ white professors, and undoubtedly the colored agricultural colleges would employ white scientists if they saw fit to do it. I assume that to be so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; it could be done; but as all the students——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I merely wish to suggest to the Senator from Georgia that it is the white scientists who propose to do this special work under the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are white scientists in Georgia devoting themselves to the study of the agricultural problems of the whole State. Their work is not limited to the students at the college. As I have said, they give a large part of their time to the whole State. The dean of that college spends probably half his time away from the college, meeting the farmers without regard to color, teaching them and advising them.

When you have the demonstration work that is to benefit the negro presented by the ablest corps of high-salaried men that can be found in our entire land, from the agricultural colleges of the University of Wisconsin and the University of Missouri, will you let them direct it for all, with an absolutely equal showing to help the negro farmers through their direction, or will you turn the negro's part of the work over to a place that can not do the work? If we gather into that school scientists equal to those that we have in the other college it would be an enormous economic waste; there would be duplication of work.

When you turn the direction of this work among the negroes to the agricultural and mechanical schools you cut off the negro by your plan from the best agency that can serve him, and from the agency that to-day is serving him.

You might say that we cut Georgia out of our State agricultural college to a large extent, because over half the faculty were not Georgians or Georgia-educated men. Why did we do it? Because we went where we could find a man who had received the best training. We went to men already skilled and procured them. We did it not against Georgia but in the interest of Georgians. We were not discriminating against our own people when we took a dean of our college of agriculture from another State, and even from another country. We took him because he had had years of study in advanced agricultural colleges and had been a leading teacher in more than one agricultural college outside of our State, and we thought he could do the work better for the people of our State than any man we had in the State. Was it a discrimination against Georgians to go outside of Georgia and select for the head of the institution the ablest man we could find for the money we could afford to pay? It was a service to Georgians that we were rendering.

And when, Mr. President and Senators, we furnish the negro as well as the white man the benefit of the faculty of the State college of agriculture to study his problems and to direct the agricultural extension work over the State, to carry what they have worked out with the college and the experiment station to his home, we give him the best. We give him what we give the whites. We would discriminate against the negro if we said we would simply give to him what was found in the negro mechanical and agricultural college.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia one question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. PAGE. Is the Senator aware that the agricultural colleges of the South that are for the benefit of the negro are protesting very loudly against what they call a discrimination in this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. None of them have protested to me. I understood there was one from Alabama who protested.

Mr. PAGE. In the last three years I have received a great many protests from the colleges of the South devoted to negroes, and I received one this morning. It will only take a minute to read it, as the Senator may wish to comment upon it:

FLORIDA AGRICULTURAL AND MECHANICAL COLLEGE FOR NEGROES,
Tallahassee, Fla., February 4, 1914.

Hon. C. S. PAGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I note the Lever-Smith bill is up in the Senate, and that an amendment was offered by our friends so as to have the negro agricultural schools become beneficiaries of the funds proposed by it.

This note is to make two requests of you: First, that you send me the records, if possible, giving an account of the debate on the bill, especially that upon the proposed amendment. I am anxious to keep a line on the discussion in detail, and also that you and those who think like you cease not in your efforts to have the bill so amended as that there will be no question that the negro agricultural colleges will become beneficiaries thereof.

I am sure there is not a State legislature in the South that would enact legislation making them beneficiaries unless it is made mandatory by the bill itself. Only those who are here know how hard it is to secure favorable legislation on any proposition looking toward the educational uplift of the negro people.

Trusting that you will be able to send me records covering the debate in question and that your efforts on our behalf will be successful, I am,

Respectfully, yours,

N. B. YOUNG, President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, that is evidently based upon a misapprehension of what this bill does. The bill does not give a dollar to either of the colleges. It does not give any to the white college; it does not give any money to the colored college. It selects or allows the legislature to select the agency of greatest capacity and puts upon it the burden of doing the work, without regard to color, throughout the entire State. Not a dollar goes to the college. Not a dollar more salary do these men receive. As I said before, we are using it all over Georgia. When they discover a disease of a plant and carry the cure into a community both the colored and the white man have the benefit of it. It is simply a question as to whether you will use the most capable and the most proficient in behalf of the colored as well as the white man, or whether you will turn over the fund that is to help the negro where it can not do him any substantial good.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I wish to state briefly the reasons why, after a good deal of consideration, I have come to a conclusion in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

I have thought that perhaps the object which that amendment has in view could be accomplished more simply and directly and better and in a way which would better agree with the views expressed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and the facts which he states; but the form of the amendment is not anything new. It is designed to continue an existing policy of legislation, and the way in which the matter presents itself to my mind is as a question whether we shall abandon a policy which aimed to encourage the negro in his efforts toward economic independence and progress or whether we shall continue it.

The bill is a bill "to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture," and it provides—

That in order to aid in diffusing among the people of the United States useful and practical information on subjects relating to agriculture and home economics, and to encourage the application of the same, there may be inaugurated in connection with the college or colleges in each State now receiving, or which may hereafter receive, the benefits of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts" (12 Stat. L., p. 503), and of the act of Congress approved August 30, 1890 (26 Stat. L., p. 417), agricultural extension work which shall be carried on in cooperation with the United States Department of Agriculture.

This is presented as a further step of progress in the development of the policy of the United States to aid agricultural institutions in the separate States. That is the basis of the bill; that is the authority for the appropriation. It is developing an established policy. Many Senators who would doubt seriously the propriety under our Constitution of embarking upon a new enterprise of this description are content to accept the long-established practice and policy of the Government, approved by time and usage, to apply the moneys of the National Government to work in these State institutions. So we must consider the subject not as a new subject, but as a development of the existing policy.

In the statute referred to, the act of August 30, 1890, was included this provision:

Provided, That in any State in which there has been one college established in pursuance of the act of July 2, 1862, and also in which an educational institution of like character has been established, or may be hereafter established, and is now aided by such State from its own revenue, for the education of colored students in agriculture and the mechanic arts, however named or styled, or whether or not it has received money heretofore under the act to which this act is an amendment, the legislature of such State may propose and report to the Secretary of the Interior a just and equitable division of the fund to be received under this act between one college for white students and one institution for colored students established as aforesaid, which shall be divided into two parts and paid accordingly, and thereupon such institution for colored students shall be entitled to the benefits of this act and subject to its provisions, as much as it would have been if it had been included under the act of 1862, and the fulfillment of the foregoing provisions shall be taken as a compliance with the provision in reference to separate colleges for white and colored students.

That same provision was carried into the act of 1907, taking a further step in advance in the execution of this policy; the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] proposes to carry substantially the same provision into this proposed act, taking a still further step; and the question, as it seems to me, is, Shall we depart from the policy which has been followed hitherto in the extending of this kind of aid to agriculture in the States by omitting from the provision which we make a requirement for a just and equitable distribution to be proposed by the authorities of the State and to be passed upon by a Federal officer of high rank?

Now, sir, I have been greatly impressed by the observations and the arguments made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. The spirit which they exhibit seems to me to be all that can be asked; it seems to be altogether admirable; and I should not for a moment hesitate to leave the good or ill fortune of anyone in whom I was interested in their hands, trusting with confidence to fair and just treatment in the spirit which they have expressed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. If this bill provided for the appropriation of money for the agricultural colleges of the States, as do the two acts to which the Senator from New York has referred, that of 1862 and 1890, I believe, I would agree with the Senator; but I think the Senator fails to make the differentiation between the purpose of the appropriations made under the two acts to which he has referred and the purpose of the appropriation proposed to be made by this bill. The two acts to which the Senator has referred appropriated money for the benefit of these colleges, and provided, and justly so, I think, that it should be distributed equitably between the white and the colored agricultural and mechanical colleges of the different States. This bill, as I called attention to yesterday, and as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has several times called attention to, does not propose to appropriate a dollar for agricultural colleges, but only provides for a certain character of agricultural work, and the agricultural colleges of the several States have nothing to do with that except to select the agencies which are to perform this work and to give them the benefit of any knowledge or information which they may have to impart to the farmer. I simply call the attention of the Senator to that difference. I do not know whether he has examined the bill with a view to considering what was the purpose of the appropriation.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I have examined the bill with great care and great interest, because I am very friendly to the bill. I think it is of great importance to the public interest that this system shall be developed, and developed along the right lines; but I do not think that the distinction which is mentioned by the Senator from North Carolina is a substantial one. This bill proposes to appropriate money to colleges; and the distinction between the kind of instruction that is to be given under the bill and the kind of instruction which has been given under former laws seems to me entirely immaterial to the purpose we are now considering. Whatever money goes to any one of these institutions will serve to strengthen and improve and energize the institution, whether it is employed in one course or another, in one way or another.

I was about to say, Mr. President, when interrupted, that admirable as is the spirit and persuasive as are the arguments of the Senators from Georgia and North Carolina, I regret they can not speak for everyone. I confess that I found myself very widely differing from the views which were expressed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] yesterday; that I can not view the omission on the part of Congress to designate the direction in which this appropriation shall go as being the same thing if the omission is to be supplied by the Senator from Georgia or by the Senator from Mississippi. We have had within the last few months expressions from the chief magistrate of another State exhibiting an attitude of mind and of feeling toward the negro race which makes me unwilling to vote for an appropriation leaving to his discretion the benefits which we all agree ought to go to black as well as to white.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. ROOT. I did not understand that the limitation of debate began until 3 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It began at 2 o'clock.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think we are all anxious to help the negro race; that we are all impelled by the same desire; and, if we differ at all, it is a difference as to the method that should be adopted.

I do not wholly agree with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], although I acknowledge his superior opportunities to know the condition in his State. We have here about 10,000,000 negroes. They must always remain in this country—negro citizens. There must never be any such thing as amalgamation. The yellow race and the white race have lived contiguously to each other; there have been individual crossings, but never has there been such a thing as an amalgamation of the particular races. Yellow still remains yellow and black still remains black, and undoubtedly throughout the coming centuries that rule will hold good. You say that that is on account of race prejudice. I would hardly call it that, Mr. President. I would rather use the words "race affinity." We have no prejudice against the black race; we have no prejudice against the yellow race; we have an affinity for our own race; and that affinity is sufficient to keep the blood of the white race reasonably pure, and keep it from any contamination, if you may call it such, with the other races of the world.

Mr. President, how are we going to help the black race? I insist—and I speak from my knowledge of human nature rather than from a particular knowledge of this or that individual—that regeneration must come from within and not from without. No nation ever trod the pathway toward enlightenment through the tutelage of any other nation in the world. If a nation or people advance, it must be through some uplifting influence that is within the heart and soul of the people themselves, and there must be an opportunity and an incentive for the development of that impulse which will reach toward higher and higher attainments.

So, Mr. President, even though the negro instructor in the South is not as capable as the white instructor, even though it is probable that those sent out to teach agriculture from the negro colleges can not accomplish as much as those sent out from the white colleges, still I would be in favor of allowing the negro to do his own work. I believe that better results will be obtained in our own public schools where the negro child has a negro teacher; I believe that in our system of educating the two races each race should be educated by its own kind.

The negro must live as a negro; he must live as an American black man; ultimately he must have his own lawyers, his own teachers, his own preachers, his own doctors, and his own dentists; and while the Senator from Georgia indicates that the negro race have not as yet developed many individuals of that capacity, he must admit that the negro has had very little opportunity so far in life to do so. So, though the work may not be as well done in Georgia by the colored instructor among his own kind as it would possibly be done by the white instructor, I do believe that keeping open the door of opportunity and encouraging the colored man to become efficient and to become capable is the only way that you will ever raise the race from its present plane to a higher social condition within itself.

Mr. President, with that view I can not agree that we should always have only white instructors, and that the negro agricultural college should not be given the hope and opportunity of developing its own young people so that they may carry on this work among their own race.

Our duty, Mr. President, is a solemn one toward the colored man. We know the conditions under which he was brought here; we know the conditions under which he must live here. Call it race prejudice, call it race affinity, yet the line of demarkation between the white and the colored races must ever remain just as it is; and it is the duty of the dominant, the more powerful race, to lend the assisting hand, not to do for the colored man what he ought to do for himself, but simply to assist him to help himself; and we never will assist him, in my opinion, by closing the door of opportunity to those of his own class.

As has been suggested by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], when we adopted the old law, of which this is an extension, that was our view; and I believe, Mr. President, that we had better follow the old rule, inasmuch as it has worked well, or reasonably well, up to the present time, and to continue aiding the colored agricultural colleges with the hope somewhere for those people to advance through their own efforts. I shall therefore, Mr. President, support the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, it was suggested to the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] that possibly he did not appreciate the difference between the proposed legislation and that already upon our statute books. His answer was to the effect that he did, but to my mind his argument was not convincing of the fact that he did appreciate the difference. It is our duty, of course, to do what we can for the negro in this country; but, Mr. President, it strikes me that the enactment of such legislation as is proposed by the amendment is not to his true interest. The difference between the prior legislation concerning appropriations for agricultural colleges and the legislation now proposed, as I understand, is this: Recognition is had in the other bills—the act of 1862 and the subsequent act referred to—of the fact that there is segregation of the races in the agricultural colleges in the South. That is a fact admitted here and recognized by legislation. Therefore the National Government, in appropriating money for agricultural colleges, itself recognizing the fact that there is segregation, has provided that the money should be equitably distributed between the black and the white agricultural colleges. But, Mr. President, there is no segregation of the races themselves in the South. There undoubtedly is social segregation. There is not the recognition upon the part of the white race of the social equality of the black. Undoubtedly, whether or not it is recognized, there remains the fact that there is not political equality between the races in the South, but that there is no segregation of the races in the South in agricultural or commercial pursuits is, I think, generally admitted.

How did the negroes of the South acquire the enormous acreage of land which the statistics introduced here show that they now own? From the white men in the South. Has it been shown here that a white man declines to sell a portion of his farm to a negro neighbor and farmer; that he does not recognize him as a commercial equal or a rival? None whatever. The truth is that the negro lives upon his own land side by side with the white man in the South, and, in so far as agricultural pursuits particularly are concerned, they are living upon an exact equality. The negro markets his product at the same market reached by the white man; he markets to the same people who pay the white man for his products; there is no distinction whatsoever in the price paid because the one is a white man and the other a negro.

Now, this proposition is not one of segregation; but it is that through certain colleges in the South instructors shall be sent out into the rural districts for the purpose of assisting to instruct those engaged in rural pursuits, in agricultural work. Does any Senator here mean to say that in pursuing such work, with the white man owning a farm side by side with the negro, the negro will be precluded from obtaining the advantage of the instruction given in that way, as though he were segregated in the classrooms of the college? No. In the one instance the negro is taught by instructors of his own race in the college; in the other instance he receives the same benefit exactly from the instruction given in the rural districts that the white man gets.

There is no segregation, as I have said, in the South such as the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] said here yesterday existed in his State. You do not find whole counties settled entirely by negroes in the South; you find no feeling there that the two races can not live together, really working hand in hand for the mutual development of their country. They do. The negro is the best friend that the white farmer has in the South, and the white farmer in the South is certainly the best friend that the negro has in the South. It is to the interest of the white farmer that his negro tenant should be taught to raise two bales of cotton where he raised only one before, and if he can urge him and prevail upon him to attend such lectures as will be given assisting him to do this, certainly he will not seek to deprive him of the benefit of such instruction.

It strikes me, as I have said, that this is the difference: In the colleges there is segregation, and there always will be, because there there is social contact. The fact might just as well be admitted—there will be always segregation of the races in the South in the schools and colleges. Whether they are supported partially by the Government or wholly by the State, there is no question that that will be done.

In the uplifting of the race, in making, as I have said, two bales of cotton grow where only one was produced before, it is to the interest directly of the white man that the negro should be educated in that line, rather than to have him remain in a condition where he knows nothing of agriculture. In the actual demonstration work the negro will get just as much benefit as the white man; and I for one, Mr. President, am inclined to think that where the negro is compelled to live, where it must be his fate that he should remain, between himself and his neighbors should be left the problems of the race issue.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have not believed that the race question is involved in this amendment. There has been a great deal of discussion about the relation between the two races—the white and the black—but the real issue here, as it seems to me, is whether, in a bill of this character, we intend to withdraw from the General Government the power to determine or to assist in determining how the money, which all the people contribute, shall be spent. The laws passed heretofore have not provided for cooperative work, and I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the very significant fact that heretofore we have appropriated money for agricultural colleges, or for the States to be expended by the agricultural colleges, but we have not attempted to introduce the element of cooperation into the work that was to be done through the expenditure of the money.

I am rather sorry that this bill has undertaken to make the work a cooperative work, but I assume that it will pass in this form, and if it is to pass in this form the position now taken by those who have it in charge with regard to the particular matter under debate is entirely inconsistent with the general scope and purpose of the bill.

Allow me to call the attention of the Senate to the differences between the aid now proposed to be extended and the aid which has heretofore been granted. We appropriate this money for—and I now quote—agricultural extension work, which shall be carried on in cooperation with the United States Department of Agriculture.

I rather favor the amendment that will be presently submitted by the Senator from South Dakota in respect to the clause I have just quoted; but I assume the bill will have in it when it finally passes the language I have just read:

Agricultural extension work, which shall be carried on in cooperation with the United States Department of Agriculture.

And then, further:

And this work shall be carried on in such manner as may be mutually agreed upon by the Secretary of Agriculture and the State agricultural college or colleges receiving the benefits of this act.

And still further:

That before the funds herein appropriated shall become available to any college for any fiscal year plans for the work to be carried on under this act shall be submitted by the proper officials of each college and approved by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The clauses I have read from the bill establish a very close relation between the Department of Agriculture and the agricultural colleges which are to be in immediate charge of the work. If it were not for an exception in this bill—an exception that is in no other bill ever passed for the purpose of extending Federal aid to agriculture—there would be no necessity for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington. In the clauses I have read we give complete power to the Department of Agriculture to negotiate and to agree with the several agricultural colleges for the expenditure of the money and the carrying on of the work. If we did not introduce the exception which I shall read in a moment, the Secretary of Agriculture would have to be satisfied with regard to the channel of distribution in each State; and if the Secretary of Agriculture believed that a portion of the money should be expended by a college teaching colored people, then it could not be expended unless his views were followed.

Now, let us see what it is that introduces the whole difficulty in this bill and is at war with the very spirit of the bill itself. This is the exception:

Provided, That in any State in which two or more such colleges have been or hereafter may be established the appropriations hereinafter made to such State shall be administered by such college or colleges as the legislature of such State may direct.

Thus there is withdrawn from the supervisory power of the Department of Agriculture the selection of the colleges in the State, if there be more than one. It is the only respect in which the power which you give to the Department of Agriculture is not complete and comprehensive. If the Department of Agriculture is adequate and competent to assist in directing this work among the people, I should like to know why it is not also competent and adequate to assist in determining which of the colleges of a State shall be the instrumentality through which the money is to be used.

We either ought to leave the whole matter to the States, without any cooperation on the part of the Department of Agriculture, leaving the States to expend the money as they deem best for the welfare of their own people, or we ought to give to the Secretary of Agriculture or some other officer of the Government the power to require an agreement with him concerning the colleges in the State.

I should like to know why an exception of this kind is made with respect to this one aspect of the entire subject. I assume that a Secretary of Agriculture or a Secretary of the Interior, any high officer of the Government, in conference with the authorities of the State, would agree that the money should be spent in that way and by those colleges which would most effectually attain the object we seek. The whole difference of opinion which has been discussed now for days before the Senate has been precipitated and accentuated by attempting to withdraw from the General Government any supervision whatsoever concerning the instrumentality through which the money shall be expended.

Therefore I intend to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington; and if that amendment does not prevail I intend to move to strike out the particular provision I have read, leaving, if the amendment should prevail, the selection of the colleges a matter of mutual agreement, as well as all other things pertaining to the expenditure of the money.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think there is a great deal of force in what the Senator has said. I should like to ask him whether he would accept, as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington, the following: Strike out the words "legislature of such State" and insert in lieu thereof "as the governor and the Secretary of Agriculture may direct," so that the paragraph would read:

Provided, That in any State in which two or more such colleges have been or hereafter may be established, the appropriation hereinafter made by such State shall be administered by such college or colleges as the governor of such State and the Secretary of Agriculture may direct.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no power to accept any suggestion coming from any Senator that would interfere with the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Would not that cover the objection the Senator has urged?

Mr. CUMMINS. So far as I am concerned, the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado is more satisfactory than the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, has the Senator from Iowa yielded the floor?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to offer an amendment as a substitute for the amendment submitted by the Senator from Washington. I will send it to the Clerk's desk, and after it is read, I should like to be heard upon it for a few moments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 14, it is proposed to strike out the words "legislature of such State," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "governor of such State and the Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the object of this amendment is to cover the exact position taken by the Senator from Iowa. There have been contending arguments made upon both sides of the Chamber as to the proportion which the colored people will get of the appropriations that are to be made under this bill. It has been contended upon the one side that they will not get any, because it is said that the legislature will designate a college from which they will get nothing. Upon the other hand, it has been contended that there have been very liberal appropriations made in aid of the colored people of the South. All seem to agree that the colored people should get a fair proportion of such appropriations.

It seems to me that instead of the long amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington, if there be stricken from the bill the words "legislature of such State" and inserted in lieu thereof the words "the governor and the Secretary of Agriculture," it will serve the purpose of providing that the Government of the United States shall hold a restraint upon the inequitable or unjust expenditure of this money, and it can be used in accordance with the best judgment of the governor and of the Secretary of Agriculture. It is contended that the colored people in the past have been discriminated against in the expenditure of funds for agricultural colleges. If so, it was under a statute similar to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington. Then why not adopt the amendment I propose, which I believe will be directly in the interest of the colored farmer?

I want to say that the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Washington is not at all applicable. In the first place, it proposes that the Secretary of the Interior shall pass upon this matter. The Secretary of the Interior ought not to be the person to determine anything under this bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That has been changed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Secretary of Agriculture is the one that ought to determine it. I can see how, under the old acts which were read by the Senator from New York, the Secretary of the Interior might be placed in the position of superintending this work.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES. I changed my amendment when I presented it, so that it is "the Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well.

Now, as to the question of a legislature determining these matters, I want to say that the agricultural colleges are in a formative condition as to numbers in many States. For instance, in my State there are two agricultural colleges—one of which has just started. Their proportions of whatever will be appropriated under this bill ought not to be determined by the legislature. The amounts ought to be changed from time to time as the executive officer of the State directs, because he knows the needs of the agricultural colleges of his State; and whenever he determines that it is to the best interests of the State that one college should have a certain amount or that the fund should be under the direction of two colleges, and certain portions should be administered by one college and certain portions by the other, it is a better judgment—it is a later judgment—than the judgment of a fixed act, which perhaps never could be changed.

You can readily see that in the formation of agricultural colleges, whenever one particular college is named by the legislature to expend the fund it becomes almost impossible to change it, because all the force and influence in behalf of that agricultural college will be used in holding every appropriation and every expenditure with that college. For that reason it is not fair to any new agricultural college that might be established. For that reason the legislature is not the proper body. The amendment says it shall negotiate with the Secretary of Agriculture.

The legislature is not a body that can very well negotiate with anyone. It passes acts. A committee of it may come to an agreement in some cases, and it may try to ratify the agreement, but it is a cumbersome body for that purpose, whereas the governor of a State can meet the Secretary of Agriculture and can agree upon matters in relation to the proper designation of the colleges to expend the fund, and also as to the amount of money that should be expended. It seems to me that would produce a much better condition than passing a legislative act, since it takes time—in some States as much as three or four years—before another legislative act could be adopted to change the law.

For these reasons, it seems to me, the fund ought not to be subject to the direction or agreement of the legislature of the State and the Secretary of Agriculture nor the legislature alone. Whenever the Secretary of Agriculture makes an approval of the college or colleges that will have the expenditure of this fund, it seems to me that is the check which the Congress of the United States is exercising and which it should exercise with relation to the expenditure of the money of the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to suggest to the Senator that if his amendment is adopted, it seems to me it ought to be satisfactory to our friends on the other side, especially in view of the fact that in section 2, at the top of page 3, is found the provision:

> This work shall be carried on in such manner as may be mutually agreed upon by the Secretary of Agriculture and the State agriculture college or colleges receiving the benefits of this act.

So that if the Senator's amendment is adopted, you would then have the Secretary of Agriculture acting with the governor in selecting the college, and you would have the Secretary of Agriculture acting with the college in carrying out the law.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me it would be a perfect safeguard with respect to the equitable expenditure of the moneys of the United States, and on that account it would be a mistake to have a legislature determine for all time, so far as we know—and it is difficult to get legislative acts repealed—what college or colleges should be designated. In some States, I understand, the legislature meets only once every four years, and no change could be made, however imperative, within that time. Consequently, it would be better to have the executive officer of the State the one who will determine the matter from year to year, if necessary. These changes ought to occur, just as I illustrated in my State the fact that we have two agricultural colleges. One, the older institution, has six or seven hundred students. The other has just been established. We would not know what to permanently apportion to that new agricultural college, but the governor can with precision determine each year the amount needed. In designating the college or colleges to receive this fund each year he would make no mistake. To contend that an act of the legislature should be passed with respect to this matter, and that for all time its designation fixed, is wrong, because our institutions are changing every year. Some portions of my State become vastly important in 5 or 10 years. Population streams to that portion of the State, and the result would be that this very little college which we have just started now may in time become as important as any, if not the most important, of the agricultural colleges of my State.

The governor of a State has the interest of all the colleges at heart. He desires to see that these funds shall be apportioned equitably between them. He is a person who at any time can negotiate with the Secretary of the Interior, and can agree, after a review of the situation, after a review of the facts, which college should be designated as the distributor of the funds. It seems to me that is far better than a legislature that has no head, that has no person that can bind the legislature.

Even if a committee comes to the Secretary of Agriculture and says, "We will designate this college," you do not know that it will be done until you go back to the legislature. Changes may take place; one portion of the State, if there are two agricultural colleges, may come in with a strong force and say, "We will not agree to that," and then you have a disagreement. You have difficulties which you do not have when you provide, as in this amendment, that the Secretary of Agriculture shall agree from time to time with the governor of the State. The check which is made upon not giving to the colored people their proper proportion of the moneys is in your own officer, and whenever he deviates from equity he is answerable upon an appeal as to what shall be done.

It seems to me that, in view of these facts, this amendment covers the situation just as it is and as the Senator from Iowa has indicated; my amendment, in only four or five words, covers the entire situation, and protects the colored people in the amount of money they will get out of the appropriations under this bill, and that in every way it will be to the advantage and interest of the legislation.

Mr. JONES. I should like to ask the Senator if he offers this as an amendment to the text of the bill?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I offer it as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I would suggest that the proper course to take would be to offer it to the bill. The Senator certainly can not offer a substitute for my amendment, which is itself in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; it covers the Senator's amendment, it seems to me. The whole object of the Senator's amendment is to prevent this very condition.

Mr. JONES. If the amendment of the Senator from Colorado were offered to the text of the bill, it would result in the perfection of the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; but it seems to me it covers the very situation of the Senator's amendment. All the matters are safeguarded in other portions of the bill in every respect.

Mr. JONES. I am not disputing that proposition, Mr. President; I am just speaking from a parliamentary standpoint. It does not seem to me that the Senator, by offering something like that as a substitute for my amendment, can prevent a vote on my proposition. It is really in the nature of an amendment to perfect the text of the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator from North Carolina indicated that he thought it ought to be acceptable to the Senator.

Mr. JONES. I am not discussing the merits of the proposition now. It is the parliamentary status in which I am interested just now.

Mr. SHAFROTH. This covers every fact that is contained in the Senator's amendment, except that his is in detail; that is all. It seems to me, therefore, it is a proper substitute for it.

Mr. JONES. It is a proper amendment to the text of the bill, but it is not a proper substitute for my amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It has reference to and covers the same subject matter. There are two plans of amending the bill, one covered by the amendment of the Senator from Washington and one by the amendment of the Senator from Colorado. The Senator from Colorado offers this as a substitute, and in voting upon the two, of course, we select whichever of the two we prefer. I shall vote for the substitute offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The clause as it now reads in the bill is as follows:

That in any State in which two or more such colleges have been or hereafter may be established the appropriations hereinafter made to such State shall be administered by such college or colleges as the legislature of such State may direct.

The Senator from Washington has moved to strike out the entire clause I have read, and to insert in lieu of it the matter which is contained in his proposed amendment, which has already been read. That substitutes an entirely new plan for that proposed in the bill. It contemplates, among other things, that the money which under the bill may belong to a particular State where there are colleges for white students and also for colored students shall be divided in some equitable proportion. Now, the Senator from Colorado moves not to substitute his amendment for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington in lieu of the entire matter which the Senator from Washington moved to strike out, but to substitute it in lieu of only a part of that matter.

The parliamentary inquiry I desire to make is whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado, instead of being a substitute, is not in the nature of an amendment to perfect the bill; and after that is done, may not the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington be voted upon? Presenting as it does a separate proposition, the Senate certainly ought to have an opportunity of voting upon it; but if it is proposed and voted upon and accepted as a substitute, then I understand the Senate would be precluded from voting upon it.

I ask the Chair for a ruling.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no doubt at all about the matter. The amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado is to the original bill, for the purpose of perfecting the text of the original bill. The amendment of the Senator from Washington goes further than that. The Chair thinks it is in order only because it is to perfect the original text, and it has the right of precedence in the vote before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Rule XVIII provides that it has precedence.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That has been the invariable ruling of the Chair ever since the present occupant of the chair has been here.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Colorado that the phraseology should be slightly changed, so as to read that the governor and the Secretary of Agriculture shall do this from year to year; otherwise it might be a permanent designation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think if there is no limitation, that should be done; but I believe that one fixing should not determine it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Therefore that language ought to be inserted, to make it clear, ought it not?

Mr. SHAFROTH. "As the governor and the Secretary of Agriculture may from time to time direct"?

Mr. POMERENE. "Annually."

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would not require it annually.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Whenever it is necessary.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Very well; "from time to time."

Mr. SHAFROTH. "From time to time;" yes.

The VICE PERSIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment as modified.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 14, it is proposed to strike out the words "legislature of such State" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "governor of such State and the Secretary of Agriculture," and after the word "may" at the end of line 14 to insert the words "from time to time"; so that, if amended, it will read:

Provided, That in any State in which two or more such colleges have been or hereafter may be established the appropriations hereinafter made to such State shall be administered by such college or colleges as the governor of such State and the Secretary of Agriculture may from time to time direct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, just a word.

I wish to say that the amendment just adopted, proposed by the Senator from Colorado, is a very, very great improvement on the original bill. I am very much gratified that that much has been changed in the bill, and that step taken in the direction in which I think it ought to be taken. I prefer, however, the proposition I have submitted, because I think it meets the situation much more equitably and fairly and more completely than the proposition submitted and just adopted.

I will simply say it has been urged very strongly here that this money does not go to the agricultural colleges, and that is largely made the basis for objecting to the proposition submitted. I think that phase of it was met very clearly in a single sentence by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. This money is appropriated by our Government, it goes somewhere, and the bill specifically states that it is to be used for the inauguration of this system in connection with the agricultural colleges. The money that goes to the agricultural colleges now simply goes there for the employment of teachers who will teach in the colleges. It possibly may be used for other purposes. The money that is to be appropriated by this bill goes to the agricultural college not for the employment of teachers to teach in the college but for the employment of teachers or demonstrators to go out from the college and teach the people or to demonstrate to the people on the outside.

In other words, if this money is appropriated and a white college is designated there is a fund that is available in connection with that college, and it is not available in connection with any other college under which the authorities of that college can employ a demonstrator—a farmer who has shown himself competent to do this demonstration work, and send him out to do the work.

It seems to me that the money goes to the college just as much as it does when you employ a teacher to teach the students who come to the college. In other words, it adds to the prestige of the college. It gives it a standing before the people that it otherwise would not have. So the distinction which is attempted to be made between the application of the fund under this act and the application of funds under the other act it seems to me is not a substantial one.

As I said in my first explanation of my amendment, my main purpose is that when this fund is appropriated to the States we shall insure by our own act of legislation that a part of the money shall be available in connection with the work of the agricultural college to which colored students go, largely for the reason that it will be an inspiration and an incentive to the colored boys to attend that school and fit themselves so that they may be selected as demonstrators.

I do not think there will be any duplication of work. The white demonstrators will go out, and if the agricultural college for the colored people can fit somebody who can be sent out as a demonstrator he will be sent to another field. It is not necessary to send him to some field that has been covered, but he will be sent to another field, and he will demonstrate to the blacks and to the whites also, and they will get a mutual benefit.

There are some sections of territory where the population is almost overwhelmingly black, and, as was suggested by the Senator from North Dakota, if they do not secure a colored man who is as competent as a white man to demonstrate, if they can secure a colored man who is reasonably competent, I believe he will accomplish more in that black territory than if you sent a white man there.

In some of the States, as I think I demonstrated the other day, there are colored people who have shown their fitness for farm demonstration work. They can be secured, and if we make it sure that a part of this money will go to the college for colored people, then the authorities of that college can go anywhere that they can find a colored man who has been educated and has shown his fitness. There are some who have demonstrated their fitness for work of this character, and they can employ them and send them out as demonstrators. That will show to the black people that the door of opportunity to those colleges is still open, and that if they will attend there and secure the education that is furnished by the college they can have the hope of being placed in these positions and be sent out as demonstrators.

I wish to say that that is a great incentive to the white man, and it would certainly be a great incentive to the black man.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

So Mr. JONES's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On page 3 of the bill, line 1, after the word "on," I move to insert "without discrimination as to race."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 1, after the words "carried on," insert the words "without discrimination as to race."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, this refers to the demonstration work upon the farms. I am informed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], in charge of the bill, that it is the purpose to have that work carried on without any discrimination as to race. In apportioning the money to the various States the colored people are taken into equal account with the white people, and this being true, and it being also the fact that those in charge of the bill intend to have it carried on without discrimination as to race, I presume there can be no opposition to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I offer a substitute for the bill, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from South Dakota modifies the proposed substitute by striking out the words "legislature of such State" and inserting "governor of such State and the Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. STERLING. Yes; I desire to have the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] incorporated in the substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will be done.

Mr. STERLING. I should also like to have incorporated in my substitute the amendment just adopted which was offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I think the words were "without discrimination as to race." I am not sure where the amendment would be applicable in the substitute, not having the original bill as amended before me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proper place will be found and the words will be inserted. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] submits a substitute, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That in order to aid the college or colleges in each State now receiving or which may hereafter receive the benefits of the act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts (12 Stat. L., 503), and of the act of Congress approved August 30, 1890 (26 Stat. L., 417), in diffusing among the people of the United States useful and practical information on subjects relating to agriculture and home economics, and to encourage the application of the same in inaugurating and carrying on college agricultural extension work, appropriations are made as hereinafter specified: Provided, That such college agricultural extension work shall consist of the giving of instruction and practical demonstrations in agriculture and home economics to persons not attending or residents in said colleges in the several communities, and imparting to such persons information on said subjects through field demonstrations, lectures, publications, and otherwise, and this work shall be carried on without discrimination as to race in such manner as may be mutually agreed upon by the Secretary of Agriculture and the State agricultural college or colleges receiving the benefits of this act: Provided further, That in any State in which two or more such colleges have been or hereafter may be established the appropriations hereinafter made to such State shall be apportioned to and administered by such colleges, respectively, as the governor of such State and the Secretary of Agriculture may from time to time direct.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of paying the expenses of said college agricultural extension work and the necessary printing and distributing of information in connection with the same, there is permanently appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $480,000 for each year, $10,000 of which shall be paid annually in the manner hereinafter provided to each State which shall, by action of its legislature, assent to the provisions of this act: Provided, That payment of such installments of the appropriation hereinbefore made as shall become due to any State before the adjournment of the regular session of the legislature meeting next after the passage of this act shall be made upon the assent of the governor thereof, duly certified to the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided further, That there is also appropriated an additional sum of $600,000 for the fiscal year following that in which the foregoing appropriation first becomes available, and for each year thereafter for seven years a sum exceeding by $600,000 the sum appropriated for each preceding year, and for each year thereafter there is permanently appropriated for each year the additional sum of $4,800,000: Provided further, That before the beginning of each fiscal year projects setting forth the proposed plans for work to be carried on under this act shall be submitted by the proper officials of each college and approved by the Secretary of Agriculture before the funds herein appropriated shall become available to such college for that fiscal year. Such additional sums shall be used only for the purpose hereinbefore stated, and shall be allotted annually to each State by the Secretary of Agriculture and paid in the manner hereinbefore provided in the proportion which the rural population of each State bears to the total rural population of all the States, as determined by the next preceding Federal census: Provided further, That no payment out of the additional appropriations herein provided shall be made in any year to any State until an equal sum has been appropriated for that year by the legislature of such State or provided by State, county, college, or local authority for the maintenance of such college agricultural extension work.

SEC. 3. That the sums hereby appropriated for extension work shall be annually paid in equal semiannual payments on the 1st day of January and July of each year by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the warrant of the Secretary of Agriculture out of the Treasury of the United States to the treasurer or other officer of the State duly authorized by the laws of the State to receive the same; and such officer shall be required to report to the Secretary of Agriculture on or before the 1st day of September of each year a detailed statement of the amount so received during the previous fiscal year and of its disbursement on forms prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 4. That if any portion of the moneys received by the designated officer of any State for the support and maintenance of college agricultural extension work, as provided in this act, shall by any action or contingency be diminished or lost, or be misapplied, it shall be replaced by said State to which it belongs, and until so replaced no subsequent appropriation shall be apportioned or paid to said State, and no portion of said moneys shall be applied, directly or indirectly, to the purchase, erection, preservation, or repair of any building or buildings, or the purchase or rental of land or in college-course teaching, lectures in colleges, promoting agricultural trains, or any other purpose not specified in this act, and not more than 5 per cent of each annual appropriation shall be applied to the printing and distribution of publications. It shall be the duty of each of said colleges annually, on or before the 1st day of January, to make to the governor of the State in which it is located a full and detailed report of its operations in the direction of extension work as defined in this act, including a detailed statement of receipts and expenditures from all sources for this purpose, a copy of which report shall be sent to the Secretary of Agriculture and to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 5. That on or before the 1st day of July in each year after the passage of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall ascertain and certify to the Secretary of the Treasury as to each State whether it is entitled to receive its share of the annual appropriation for college agricultural extension work under this act and the amount which it is entitled, respectively, to receive. If the Secretary of Agriculture shall withhold a certificate from any State of its appropriation, the facts and reasons therefor shall be reported to the President, and the amount involved shall be kept separate in the Treasury until the expiration of the Congress next succeeding a session of the legislature of any State from which a certificate has been withheld, in order that the State may, if it should so desire, appeal to Congress from the determination of the Secretary of Agriculture. If the next Congress shall not direct such sum to be paid, it shall be covered into the Treasury.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall make an annual report to Congress of the receipts, expenditures, and results of the college agricultural extension work in all of the States receiving the benefits of this act, and also whether the appropriation of any State has been withheld; and if so, the reasons therefor.

SEC. 7. That Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal any or all of the provisions of this act.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I think the substitute now offered includes all the amendments that have been offered since the introduction of the substitute on January 29. The substitute itself makes a material change in section 1 of the original bill, and merges section 2 of that bill into section 1 of the substitute.

The material change made is the striking out of the following words in section 2 of House bill 7951:

And this work shall be carried on in such manner as may be mutually agreed upon by the Secretary of Agriculture and the State agricultural college or colleges receiving the benefits of this act.

And the striking out also of the word "cooperative" wherever it occurs in the bill.

Mr. President, I can not better illustrate the proposition here involved than to refer to a statement made the other day when the bill was first before the Senate by the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] in charge of the measure. This was the statement made on page 1889 of the RECORD for January 17. In answer to an inquiry I made, the Senator from Georgia said:

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Replying further to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], I wish to call his attention to the fact that this bill limits the employment of the force and the conduct of this work exclusively to the colleges of agriculture. The Department of Agriculture here will not employ a man, will not control the work, and will have no connection with the actual work done, but the State college will conduct the work. The only part the Department of Agriculture has is that when the representatives of the college get up their plan for the ensuing year it is submitted to the department here for its approval. That being obtained, the relation of the department to it ceases and the work is conducted exclusively by the land-grant colleges.

That was the construction put by the Senator from Georgia at that time upon House bill 7951, for which I have offered this substitute. When the Senator from Georgia thus explained the bill he seemed to speak with all the force of conviction and as though the bill reflected his judgment in providing that the control of this demonstration work should be solely under the agricultural colleges. If the bill itself, Mr. President, bore this construction, there would be no cause of complaint; but the fear is, and I can not help but think the certainty is, that it will bear no such construction. In order that there may be no doubt about it, that there may be no mooted question hereafter in regard to this and that this measure may accord with my ideas as well as with those of the Senator from Georgia, I have introduced this substitute, taking out of the bill the cooperative feature as provided in the clause which I read a little while ago, which provides that the work should be carried on as mutually agreed upon between the Secretary of Agriculture and the agricultural colleges.

Mr. President, because of the brevity of the time allowed here I have summarized some of my objections to this feature of the bill, and I sincerely hope that they may have, and I confidently believe the proposition here involved will have, the earnest consideration of Senators.

The effect of this provision is to give the Secretary of Agriculture more power in the control and disposition of this fund than I am willing to see conferred upon him, more than I believe Senators will be willing to confer upon him when they consider the far-reaching effect of this measure and of this cooperative clause. It in effect gives him the power to demand as a condition precedent to the right of a State to share in the fund that he, the Secretary, be permitted to originate and initiate the plans to be followed by a State or a State agricultural college in its farm demonstration and home economics work.

Second. I am opposed to this so-called cooperative feature of the bill because of the State subordination and subserviency involved in such a course.

The State will be put in this position: It will fear the loss of money which otherwise would be spent within the State in the employment of men there, in the paying of bills there, and, in common parlance, the "making of more business" within the State, and it will be induced to consent to methods and to the employment of men which under ordinary conditions would not meet the approval of the sober judgment of the people of the State and of the agricultural college and which the farmers themselves would condemn.

Third. I oppose this feature of the bill because in order to get the money the State may be required to consent that the work shall be carried on by men to be designated by the Secretary of Agriculture or some official in that department and by the department's present field force, without regard to the equipment of the colleges or what they have done or may do in the matter of training men for the same work or in procuring men from the outside.

That this is true is evidenced by the declaration of Dr. Galloway, the first assistant of the Secretary of Agriculture, who himself said in the hearings of the House committee that it was the plan to take the men now engaged by the Agricultural Department into the demonstration work and put them into this field and into the work contemplated by this bill.

Fourth. Under this tremendous power to insist upon and designate Government employees to do the work, which brings them in close personal contact with the individual farmer at his home, there lurks a grave political danger. To a party in power or to any administration of any party which is not at all sensitive to the demands of civil service it will give opportunity to make "agricultural experts" out of gentlemen whose highest qualifications are that they have been political experts. For that reason I am opposed to the bill as it stands.

Fifth. But, barring all partisan or political considerations, the policy proposed in this cooperative feature will result in a loss of efficiency and in consequent economic loss. The men who from their youth or boyhood have lived within the State, have worked on the farm there, have taken their agricultural college course there, and then, in addition, have been taught how to teach and demonstrate, in addition to being entitled to the first opportunity to engage in such work, are the men of all others best equipped for the specific work provided for in this bill.

The State would better adopt a policy of exclusion of all outside aid and forego the money benefits of this bill than to pay the dear price of neglecting its own resources of brain and brawn, of neglecting the development and use of its own men in order to get such benefits. The State by such a course would be better off in the long run if under this bill, as I believe its effect will be, the young men in the State who get their training at the agricultural colleges are to be supplanted or their work made unnecessary because of the men sent out by the Agricultural Department.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. STERLING. I should like to yield to the Senator, but, if he will recall, my time is limited.

Mr. SIMMONS. I had overlooked the fact that the Senator was speaking under the 15-minute rule, or I would not have sought to interrupt him.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I attribute to the Senator from Georgia the highest good faith in his advocacy of this measure as it is. The Senate and the country are indebted to him for the zeal and the ability he has shown in working for improved agricultural conditions. I appreciate the wise statesmanship of himself and fellow Senators of the South, which, recognizing agriculture more than all else as the basis of their prosperity, present and future, would bring the Southern States into their own by developing to the utmost this great, wholesome, and, more than all others, independent industry. I do not criticize them for resorting to every legitimate means, Federal as well as State, to accomplish their worthy purpose.

But as to the cooperative feature of this bill I have my suspicions, not of the distinguished Senator from Georgia, not of the Secretary of Agriculture himself, but knowing a few things, and something of men and the motives which influence them, a man can divine a few things. The cooperative feature of the bill would never have been put there had it not been suggested or insisted upon by some official or officials, aside from the chief, in the Department of Agriculture. They have had some experiences; the employees of the department have not always impressed the farmers with a sense of superior knowledge on the part of the employee, or the demonstration "did not work," or the farmers of a particular locality were not enthusiastic, or were not in a receptive mood, and the people of the agricultural college were sometimes even less so; there has been some friction and some conflict of jurisdiction. To obviate all this and make the farmer take the dose "willy-nilly," it is proposed to compel him to cooperate.

I say such is the plain meaning of that particular clause of the bill which it is proposed shall be stricken out by the substitute, the clause which requires the Secretary of Agriculture and the college authorities to mutually agree upon the work to be carried on. There will be the tendency of the department to go to the limit in the exercise of its power. The Secretary of Agriculture, influenced by the report of some subordinate, might sit down with the president or dean of an agricultural college and say: "Gentlemen, I have here a plan, we have given it study, and we have determined to carry out this plan in your particular State. Are you agreed to it? If you are, the money is yours."

Cooperation is a fine word—a word to conjure with in our modern industrial life; but compulsory cooperation, unless under very special circumstances, is a contradiction in terms. There has been some friction between officials of the Agricultural Department and the men of the agricultural colleges and experiment stations—not much, perhaps, but some—even where cooperation was voluntary; but if you want real friction, friction that will start a fire and singe things, just make it compulsory as between supposedly free men or free institutions. But, Mr. President, more than all else, I object to this feature of the bill because it involves the extreme of paternalism. Nothing like this has ever been attempted in Federal legislation. Men objected to the Alaskan railroad bill because it meant Government ownership, and that means paternalism; but there is no comparison. The Government will not in owning and operating any railroad be in the business of fathering the enterprise and directing the conduct and work of the individual citizen.

When hog cholera was under discussion the misgiving was felt that the administering of the serum and the cutting off of the tail of the swine for the purpose of getting the infected blood was not a proper governmental function. But the paternalism involved in this bill is gross in comparison with that. Hog cholera is a scourge from which no section is immune. It is not local. The department, through its Bureau of Animal Industry, has the entire field before it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I only desire to say a word. If the Secretary of Agriculture should undertake arbitrarily to withhold the fund from a State or to raise a point as to its use, and upon that point withhold it, the subject would come back to Congress for our consideration; and it can safely be expected that the representatives of the State in Congress will see that upon no frivolous ground is the money kept from the State. The fund goes to the State agent designated by the State legislature; and I still believe, as I said a few days ago, that under the bill the agents are to be designated by the State authorities; indeed, the Senate voted down a proposed amendment which undertook to add, after the word "manner," the words "and by such agents."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I am very much interested in the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] and in the explanation which he has been making of that amendment. I have not yet come to a conclusion in my own mind as to whether or not I should support it, and I should like to ask him in my time to complete the sentence and description of the amendment which he was giving to the Senate a few moments ago.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I rise to ask that unanimous consent be given to the Senator from South Dakota to continue for 10 minutes longer.

Mr. GALLINGER. That can not be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That can not be done. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. WEEKS. I have asked a question of the Senator from South Dakota, Mr. President.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] and I also thank the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] for their kindness. I appreciate the force of the rule, and hence thought I should be able to bring my remarks within the 15-minute limit. Just a word or two further.

I think I was speaking with reference to those things in regard to which the General Government might naturally do certain work. I said with reference to the activity of the Government in the matter of hog cholera—and the same thing might be said as well with reference to other animal diseases—that the Government has its specialists and scientists, who make investigations and search for cause and remedy, and the people may well say, with reference to a disease like this, that they are entitled to the relief which the superior knowledge of those in the Agricultural Department have gleaned from the wide field over which their operations extend; but here I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts the pending bill will permit the enforced interference of the Federal Government in problems so commonplace, so everyday, so local, and so individual as knowing how to plow and plant and fertilize, and knowing how to cook and sew and having a care for cleanliness and sanitation. That, to my mind, is not an inspiring spectacle. It is contrary, as I view it, to the spirit of our institutions, to our dual system of government, under which the General Government must depend for its life and vigor on the vitality and strength of the several parts; and that vitality and that strength are best secured by leaving the solution of every problem here involved to the voluntary action and initiative of the States themselves.

I thank the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I want to thank the Senator from South Dakota for the great clearness with which he has answered my question.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, before we pass from the general subject comprised in this bill I think that a statement which the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] seems to have made in his speech of a day or two ago, to which I did not have the pleasure of listening in full, but which I find in the RECORD, should be modified and explained so far as it relates to the State of Delaware.

The Senator from Washington seems to have said that in Delaware we have no colored colleges and no colored teachers. I fancy he did not intend to make that statement, as it would seem an injustice to some very worthy colored men in my State, but that seems to be the purport of his statement, found on page 3192 of the RECORD.

I want to say to the Senator from Washington that we have a most admirable college for the colored people in Delaware. That college is administered by a colored president and a corps of colored teachers, all of whom are very good and efficient men in their departments. The president of the board of trustees of that college is our chief justice, and has been, to my knowledge, for a great many years. That college is very efficiently administered for colored people by members of their own race as teachers. I fancy the Senator from Washington did not intend to reflect upon these teachers or to make any such statement as seems to be included in his speech.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Delaware for calling my attention to the language to which he refers, because I certainly did not intend to reflect upon the State of Delaware or to convey the impression that there were no colored teachers in Delaware, or, in fact, in any other State. I think it appears clearly from what preceded the sentence to which the Senator calls attention that I was referring to the attendance of colored students and white students at the different agricultural colleges in the various States, and that the first part of the answer given there, to which I presume the Senator refers—has reference to the attendance of the colored students at the different agricultural colleges. Then, evidently, I started to refer to the question of the employment of colored teachers in the different States and was then interrupted, as is indicated here in the RECORD. I did not, as I have said, intend to convey the impression that no colored teachers were employed in Delaware or in any other State. Further on in my speech I named the States that I had in mind, and also gave the number of teachers, both white and colored, in the higher schools. I again thank the Senator for calling my attention to the matter, so that it may be made perfectly clear.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Gallinger	Oliver	Smith, Mich.
Bradley	Hollis	Overman	Smith, S. C.

Mr. SWANSON. My colleague [Mr. MARTIN of Virginia] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He is paired with the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON].

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to again announce that my colleague [Mr. LANE] is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, without asking for the reading of the amendment, I wish to ask the Senator from South Dakota to tell me in a word just what the amendment proposes to do.

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator from Michigan that the amendment simply proposes to strike out the feature of the bill which requires an agreement between the Secretary of Agriculture and the head of the agricultural college in regard to the work to be carried on.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Who is to have charge of it?

Mr. STERLING. The proposition involved in the substitute is that the colleges themselves shall take the initiative in proposing this work. The Secretary of Agriculture is to supervise the work, at least to the extent that he is left to approve any project for farm demonstration work that is to be carried on by the college, the same as in the original bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Dakota.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I wish to take just a few moments of the time of the Senate to explain to some of the friends of the original vocational educational bill, introduced by me, what has seemed to be an inconsistency on my part in supporting this measure.

I wish to say in all candor that I believe that the two provisions of Senate bill No. 3, introduced by me, vocational education and agricultural extension, should go forward as one measure. I think I should have supported the measure now under consideration under any conditions, because I believe it is one that will result in good to the American farmer, but, in my judgment, we are going at this work at the wrong end. We are seeking to advance the cause of agriculture by taking instruction to the adult farmer on the farm, without in any way taking into account the farmer's boy and the farmer's girl, or, at least, only in an indirect and minor way.

In my judgment, if we are to change the economic conditions of our country with reference to farm life, we must commence with the boy. The father will soon pass off the stage of action, and his place will be taken by his sons; and we must in some way or other convince the boy that farming as a business, as a vocation, can not only be made equally as pleasurable as other vocations, but equally as profitable.

There is no man to-day conversant with the conditions of farm life who does not know that the boy, as soon as he becomes able to look over the broader fields of life for himself, very naturally reaches the conclusion that there is some place where he can make money faster and where he can have an easier and more pleasant life than he can on the farm.

The colloquy which took place the other day between the senior Senator from Iowa and the junior Senator from California sought, as it seemed to me, to peer into the future to see, as they said, how this bill was going to work out—a very proper thing to do. If in all that we do here in the Senate which pertains to taking large sums of money from the Federal Treasury we should first insist upon being shown how the measure would work out, we should take a great deal less money from the Treasury. I think the measure at present before us, taken in connection with that part of what is known as the vocational educational bill, which I hope we shall soon pass, will work out well.

I have given that feature a great deal of study, and I think I can explain to Senators how, as one measure and in cooperation, the two would work out satisfactorily. My optimism, my respect for the ability of the junior Senator from Georgia, and my hope and my trust are so great that I am going to believe that in due time these two measures will go forward, one following the other, to be sure, but yet go forward in such a way that they will cooperate.

Let me first take up some of the features of the vocational education bill. If that bill is enacted into law, it will mean that in every agricultural section of this country, at least in every rural section where agriculture is a dominant work of that section, there will be an agricultural school. The teacher of that school will be a man fairly well versed in the ordinary branches of study, although not necessarily a superior teacher in the high-school branches. He will rather be a progressive, intelligent, up-to-date farmer. He will teach in the schoolroom during the fall and winter months that part of agricultural education which can be taught from books. He will be hired, not as the ordinary teacher is for the terms of school, but by the year; and in the springtime he will go out upon the farm and teach the boys, in actual practice, what they have been taught theoretically in the schoolroom. He will go to the fathers of the boys of his school and ask that he give them a plat of land to cultivate for themselves, a plat of land that shall be their very own, where they would understand that the products of their little plat should be theirs, and the funds derived from the sale of the crops therefrom be theirs to spend. That teacher would have in every important section of the town plats of land where he could do demonstration work, plats scientifically cultivated under his own supervision, where he might show to the adult farmers of the town that judicious, up-to-date agriculture would pay.

And now, Mr. President, we come to the work contemplated by the bill offered by the Senator from Georgia, now before us.

The farmer-teacher would have for his unit the town. His principal work would be to educate the farmer boys in his own town, but the man sent out from the college under the provisions of the bill before us would have the county as his unit. Under this bill, presumably, a man will be sent out from the college of higher class and of greater technical knowledge than the town teacher. He will supervise the educational work of the several town teachers and cooperate with them. When he goes into a town he will find, to speak figuratively, that the field has been plowed and harrowed and fertilized, ready for him to sow the seed when he comes.

I insist, Mr. President, that there can be no such benefit derived from the operation of this bill alone as could be had from these two forces to which I have referred working together. As I understand it, there is no feature of the bill before us that provides education for the farmers' sons and daughters. It is designed, at least primarily, to carry information to the adult farmer on the farm.

I do not like generally to speak from personal experience, but I think I may be permitted to say that I was a farmer's boy. I was brought up in my early life on the farm, and I speak from knowledge. I can remember that when I was a boy I used to like to go to the schoolhouse about half an hour before the school commenced, in order that I might play snowball with the boys or play "ring around rosy" with the girls. I rather think the latter was the more enticing to me. In order to do that I had to get up at 4 o'clock in the morning to do my chores. My father had what we called the "home farm" and the "hill farm." I used to feed the cattle, milk the cows, clean off the horses, clean out the stable at the home farm, and then go up to the hill farm, where we kept the heifers that were not giving milk. I have been up there time after time when the weather was 20° below zero, and not infrequently 30° below, with the wind blowing 30 or 40 miles an hour.

Every farmer boy knows that you can not drive a cow to water when it is very cold or very windy without a good deal of work. I had to go down to the spring, some 30 rods below the barn, and cut out the ice so that the cattle could drink, and then, with a good deal of difficulty, drive the cattle to the spring. I only wonder now, as I look back upon that life, that I did not have my feet and hands and nose and ears frozen. I frequently did have the tips of my ears touched by frost, yet as I look back upon that life I think I see that in it I laid the foundation for a constitution which I would not have otherwise possessed. I do not regret it, and yet when I reached the time of life where I was looking forward to see what I would do for a vocation I need not say that I thought there was probably some way in which I could earn a livelihood easier and with greater pleasure than by working on the farm.

Those conditions are substantially the same now. The boy on the farm sees that he has to work several hours per day more than the boy in the city or in the urban sections or at some trade. It is not difficult to see why, with this condition existing, the great body of the farmer boys, when they get through with the high-school, drift off to the cities and add to the already very congested conditions of the urban sections.

This must be changed. We can not materially improve the economic conditions of this country as they relate to farm life unless we can change these conditions; and they can only be changed by starting at the foundation—the boy—and so educating him that he will come to have a love for the farm and a belief that farming can be made as profitable as other vocations.

I am going to hope that Senators will look at this bill in this way and will conclude that whatever might be the result of this bill taken alone we are later on going to have agricultural extension and vocational education in cooperation, and that the results of the two taken together will be most beneficent and satisfactory to the agricultural interests of this country.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

Mr. WEEKS. There are six amendments on the memorandum which I send up, all of the same character. I offer the first one.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 7, after the word "colleges," it is proposed to insert "or departments or boards of agriculture."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, my purpose in offering the amendment is that in Massachusetts we have an agricultural college and also a State board of agriculture doing work of this kind; and it seems to me that under such conditions there should be a possibility of turning this money over to either the college or the department of agriculture, whichever is doing the work which more nearly complies with the requirements of this law. As a matter of fact, the department of agriculture is doing exactly that kind of work. It has meetings of one kind or another during the year and has a much greater demand for expenditures along this line than the appropriation which is made by the State. I think in that way the money would be as wisely expended as if it were confined to the colleges.

I hope the Senator from Georgia will accept the amendment. If the first amendment is accepted, there are five other places in the bill where it should be included. I therefore suggest that I will offer the other amendments later if this one is agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I regret that I am compelled to differ with the Senator from Massachusetts. There may be several States in which it would be desirable at the present time to handle this fund, in part, through their organized agricultural activities outside of the college. After very carefully considering the matter, however, it was concluded that this is really a bill designed largely to carry to the people the knowledge that the colleges and experiment stations have developed. It is an extension of what is already a national activity. It was thought that to undertake to spread it beyond the colleges into a double agency of control in the States would be likely to lead to such trouble that it would be inadvisable to give it that direction.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if he thinks there would be any danger or any harm in leaving to the States the agency through which this money should be expended, either the agricultural college or the State department of agriculture?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have a great deal of confidence in the colleges of agriculture, and I really think it is safer to leave it there.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know what the Senator's experience is, but I feel confident that in Massachusetts the money would be as wisely expended through the State department of agriculture as in any other way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I want to say, in behalf of the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, that this whole question of the control of money appropriated by Congress for Federal aid to education is one which has perhaps caused more debate and more contention than almost any other that came before us in working out the great problem of vocational education. In considering the main bill, the final conclusion reached by those who had the matter in charge was that the measure would not work out satisfactorily unless the States were allowed to have—subject to Federal oversight and supervision, of course—the control of the appropriations.

In regard to the general educational fund called for by Senate bill No. 3, it was provided that a board for vocational education should be appointed by the legislature of each State, and that this board, subject, of course, to the provisions of the bill, should have the power to say how this fund should be expended.

Let me say that I am not seeking to interfere in any way with the bill as introduced by the Senator from Georgia. I only wish to say, for his information and for the information of the Senate, that if there was any feature pertaining to the bill granting Federal aid for vocational education which provoked prolonged contention and discussion, it was as to what board should have control of the expenditure of the fund. I wish also to say to the Senator from Georgia that after months and months, and I do not know but I may say after years of investigation, I found that the only way in which this matter would work out satisfactorily to the States was by giving the disposition and control of this fund into the hands of some organization or body to be named by the legislatures of the States. I presume the results will work out all right as provided in the measure before us, but if the Senator from Georgia should write to all States of the Union and get their opinions he would find more divergence upon this point than perhaps upon any other in his bill.

The junior Senator from Georgia has worked, as I chance to know, largely in cooperation with the State agricultural colleges in the furtherance of his bill. The agricultural colleges have joined together and have, in a most powerful way, pressed the Smith-Lever bill, because under that bill they were to have the exclusive control of this great fund.

I did not expect to go into this feature of the matter at all, but perhaps I may properly say, for the information of the Senate, what has been done in behalf of the agricultural colleges. They have had a pretty good taste of money and are quite ambitious for more. Here is what the agricultural colleges are to-day getting:

In the first place, they have the benefit of the original Morrill Agricultural Act of 1862. Later, in 1887, Congress appropriated $15,000 annually to each State for experiment stations. Then, by the second Morrill Act, of 1890, we gave them $25,000 annually in addition. In 1906, under the Adams Act, we doubled the appropriations under the Hatch Act by giving an additional $15,000 annually to each State for these State experiment stations. In 1907, under what is known as the Nelson amendment, we added another $25,000 to this fund. These four appropriations, which supplement the original Morrill Act, give to each State agricultural college $80,000 per annum, if I am correctly informed.

I have great respect for the agricultural colleges of this country. They are doing good work. The State experiment station in my own State is doing most excellent work. I regret to say, however, that there has been no one force that has fought the general bill for the promotion of industrial education like some of the agricultural colleges. They have an organization that is one of the most powerful in the country. Acting with this organization is what is known as the American Soil Fertility League. Mr. H. H. Gross, of Chicago, is the active executive man of this league, and he told me that he had at his disposal a fund of more than $25,000 a year. I am quite sure he told me that five different railroads had agreed to pay $5,000 a year for five years or more, and that he also had other funds at his disposal.

Mr. Gross, as the active agent of that organization, came to me after I took charge of the bill for the granting of Federal aid for vocational education and told me that he was thoroughly in favor of the Page bill, and that all I need to do was to help him get through this bill, and he would put his shoulder behind the Page vocational-education bill and push it to success. I declined to do it, not because I did not think his bill a good one, but because I did not wish to see my bill dismembered. After he found that I would not do his bidding he said: "I have changed my mind with regard to your bill. I think it is a very bad bill"; and he flooded this country with circulars, which I think every Senator received, setting forth in terms that I knew were unfair what he was pleased to say were the bad and unwise features of the Page bill.

I mention this in all good nature. I hope the Senator from Georgia will not think that in what I am saying I am trying to oppose his bill, because I am not. I want to see it passed. It is a good measure. I simply say that in my opinion there are a hundred reasons why the two bills should have gone through together and not one why they should not. But this is only my opinion, and upon this point he and I disagree. I yield to the inevitable, hoping that later on he will be as good to the balance of my bill as I have tried to be to his measure.

In closing, I wish to say to all my friends here who have stood by my vocational-education bill so faithfully that I hope they will all vote for this bill. I believe if they do the Senate and the country will later on stand behind Federal aid for vocational education with such vigor that when we get to that bill nothing can stop its passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when the Senate bill was under consideration I made a suggestion which the Senator from Georgia kindly acceded to, that section 3 should be amended, on line 19 of page 4 of this bill, by striking out the word "or" after "college," and inserting the words "or individual contributions" after the word "authority."

I trust the Senator will permit that amendment to go into the bill and go to conference, and then if it is not thought a wise thing to do it can be dropped out.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not object to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, I move that amendment on line 19, page 4, to strike out the word "or" before the word "local," and, after the word "authority," to insert the words "or individual contributions."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 19, it is proposed to strike out the word "or" before the word "local," and after the word "authority" to insert a comma and the words "or individual contributions."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the phraseology of section 4, "That the sums hereby appropriated for extension work shall be annually paid in equal semiannual payments on the 1st day of January and July of each year," and so forth. It is not important perhaps, but it seems to me the word "annually" there is a matter of supererogation and might well go out of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In what section?

Mr. GALLINGER. Section 4, the first two lines. My suggestion is to strike out the word "annually." I think it will be better language. That likewise can go to conference, and if it is desired it can be restored.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have no objection to that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 23, strike out the word "annually."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to call attention to page 2, line 8. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] has called to my attention the fact that there are two chapters on that page. So, after the words "four hundred and seventeen," I move to amend by adding "chapter 841," which is the chapter that we have under consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the words "four hundred and seventeen," in line 8, insert "chapter 841," so as to read: "Twenty-sixth Statutes at Large, page 417, chapter 841."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before that is done I should like to have read the amendment that was offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] and agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 14, strike out the words "legislature of such State" and insert "governor of such State and the Secretary of Agriculture," and after the word "may" insert "from time to time," so that if amended it will read:

The appropriations hereinafter made to such State shall be administered by such college or colleges as the governor of such State and the Secretary of Agriculture may from time to time direct.

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume there will be no difficulty about it, but my suggestion would be that the word "jointly" might be inserted after the word "may."

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think it is necessary, but I do not see any objection to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. It makes it a little clearer. If there is no objection, I would suggest the insertion of the word "jointly."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "may," in line 14, page 2, insert the word "jointly."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 17, strike out the word "shall" and insert in lieu thereof the words "may in the absence of prior legislative assent," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That payment of such installments of the appropriation hereinbefore made as shall become due to any State before the adjournment of the regular session of the legislature meeting next after the passage of this act may, in the absence of prior legislative assent, be made upon the assent of the governor thereof, duly certified to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, the bill as now phrased requires the assent of the governor, even though the assent of the legislature now in session may be given to the provisions of the bill. There are a good many legislatures now in session, and there is no reason why the assent of the governor should be required if they assent to the provisions. It is merely a verbal correction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE].

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was some question as to the title.

Mr. WEEKS. It will not be necessary to change the title on account of the adoption of amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The title will stand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senate having passed House bill 7951, I move that the bill (S. 3091) to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senate bill will be indefinitely postponed.

THE COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I send to the desk a notice that I ask may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The notice will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Indiana gives notice that on Monday next, the 9th day of February, 1914, at the conclusion of the routine morning business, he will move to so amend Rule XXV that the Committee on Naval Affairs shall consist of 16 Senators instead of 15 Senators as at present constituted.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask the Senator from Indiana if he will not defer that until Tuesday. Some of us have to leave Monday to attend the funeral of the late Representative BREMNER, and I should like to be here when the matter comes up.

Mr. KERN. I shall be very glad to accommodate the Senator from Minnesota. The notice may be changed to Tuesday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That modification in the notice will be made.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BRYAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 6 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 9, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 7, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father of truth, arouse in us the strongest indignation, the most righteous hatred, of all forms of sham and hypocrisy, in society, in business, in politics, in religion; that the term "whited sepulcher" may not be applied to any of us. To be clean without and foul within is the sin of sins, and aroused in the heart of the Christ the most scathing rebuke.

"The world is always in need of the man with courage and sincerity, who will say what he means and mean what he says." Make us that man. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LINDBERGH, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of the illness of his mother.

EMILY CHANCEY.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri offers a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts, which the Clerk will report.

House resolution 393 (H. Rept. 235).

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Emily Chancey, widow of John T. Chancey, late a special employee of the House, an amount equal to six months of his compensation as such employee and an additional amount, not exceeding $250, to defray the funeral expenses of said John T. Chancey.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

NELLIE TAYLOR.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I also present the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri also presents a further privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 398 (H. Rept. 236).

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Nellie Taylor, daughter of Daniel Taylor, late an employee of the House, an amount equal to six months of his compensation as such employee, and an additional amount, not exceeding $250, to William S. Riley, undertaker, to defray the funeral expenses of said Daniel Taylor.

Also the following committee amendments were read:

Amend, page 1, line 8, by striking out the words "Nellie Taylor, daughter," and insert "the legal representative."

In lines 6 and 7, strike out the words "William S. Riley, undertaker, to."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

NATIONAL CORN EXPOSITION, DALLAS, TEX.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following invitation, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 6, 1914.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The president and board of directors of the Sixth National Corn Exposition take pleasure in announcing to the House of Representatives of the United States that they will, on the 10th day of February, 1914, open the National Corn Exposition, at Dallas, Tex., which exposition is participated in by practically all of the States in the Union and by the National Department of Agriculture.

Said exposition will be open until February 24, and I am authorized and directed by the president and board of directors of said exposition to request the honor of the presence of the Members of the House of Representatives of the United States at whatever time it will be most convenient for them to attend.

Respectfully, yours,

HATTON W. SUMNERS.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 405.

Resolved, That the invitation of the officers and directors of the Sixth National Corn Exposition at Dallas, Tex., to attend said exposition be accepted, and that a committee from the membership of the House be designated by the Speaker to attend said exposition on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I did not hear all of the resolution read. Does it provide for an acceptance of the invitation?

Mr. SUMNERS. It provides for an acceptance of the invitation, but it does not carry any appropriation.

Mr. MANN. What is meant by an acceptance of the invitation?

Mr. SUMNERS. It means that the Speaker, if the invitation be accepted, will designate a committee from the House, from among the gentlemen who can do so, to attend as representatives of the House.

Mr. MANN. Does the resolution provide for the appointment of a committee?

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not expect that a committee composed of Members of the House is going down there at its own expense?

Mr. SUMNERS. I do expect it; yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman has not been here as long as I have.

Mr. SUMNERS. I know they are going down there, and I know who are going if the resolution is adopted.

Mr. MANN. I have heard that before under similar circumstances, and I do not recall any case now where subsequently we did not pay the expenses.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman permit? The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], who resides in Dallas, states as a Member of the House that the Congress will not be called upon to make any appropriation for the expense of this committee.

The idea of having it designated by the Speaker is that they may go there in a more or less official capacity, and that their absence from here may not be criticized by their constituents, because they are fulfilling a mission of the House. And I might say further to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that it is possible, if not probable, that the parties in charge of this exposition may assume the expense of this committee themselves. And I hope he will not object.

Mr. MANN. How large a committee is expected to absent itself from the House in order to go there?

Mr. GARNER. Well, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] would like to get a right nice little bunch of Representatives from the gentleman's section of the country to go down and see something of the State of Texas and of the corn produced in that section.

Mr. MANN. I ask my friend from Texas [Mr. GARNER] which he considers the most important, for Members of the House to go to Dallas, Tex., where they can be of no earthly use, or remain here in the House, where they belong and where they may be of some service to the Government?

Mr. GARNER. "The gentleman from Texas" does not care to go into that phase of the matter just at this time. I can see absolutely no reason why, if Members of Congress feel that they could be of service to the country by attending a national exhibition that has been indorsed or, rather, authorized by an act of Congress, there could be any objection to their going.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think we have three resolutions reported that are now on the calendar providing for the acceptance of invitations to attend conventions or something of that nature, all of which provide, with one exception, that there shall be no expense to the Government or no appropriation, one, I believe, fixing the appropriation at $1,000.

I do not think I shall object to this resolution, but I am opposed to providing officially for the representation of Congress or of the Government to attend conventions without taking the responsibility of paying the expenses. I do not have a very high idea of a committee or delegation or representation which goes officially but which is not important enough to have its expenses paid. When these other propositions shall come up I am sorry to say now that if they come with a request for unanimous consent I propose to object.

Mr. GARNER. Question, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman object? Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to this resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to inquire of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] as to how many Members he would like to have on his committee. Do not make them too many, because business is pressing.

Mr. MANN. Let the whole Congress go. Let us take a vacation. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Speaker, of course Dallas would be glad to have as many Members of Congress selected as can conveniently attend. We do expect to have about five or six Members attend.

And may I just state in this connection, Mr. Speaker, if I may do so with unanimous consent—and I shall be very brief—that as to this character of resolutions I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as a general proposition. The duty of Members of Congress is to be here. But this is a great national meeting of men who produce the grain of the United States, and I believe it is not a loss of time for Members of Congress who have to deal with the problems that concern agriculture to come in contact with the men who are leaders in agricultural production and in connection with the matters that have to do with that economic problem.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint the committee later.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE FOR THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. PALMER rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a statement for one or two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, the bill known as the Philadelphia judgeship bill, providing for an additional judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, is now on the Speaker's table in the shape of a conference report, disagreeing to Senate amendment No. 1, which strikes out what is known as the Cullop amendment to the bill, providing for publicity to be given by the President to the indorsers of the successful applicant for the judgeship. It was generally stated to Members yesterday that the bill would come up to-day.

I simply desire to say that Judge CULLOP, who is the author of this amendment and is very much interested in it, has had a death in his family, which necessitates his abence to-day, and the friends of the bill have therefore agreed that it shall go over until Monday morning. While I do not agree with Judge CULLOP's position, I felt it to be entirely fair, in view of the active fight he has made in behalf of this proposition, that the conference report should not come up in his absence. I just desire to give notice to the Members that the conference report will be called up on Monday, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

RURAL POST ROADS.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11686) to provide that the United States shall, in certain cases, aid the States and the civil subdivisions thereof in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire of the Clerk how much time was used last night?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Two hours and a half.

The SPEAKER. How much time is there left?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Four hours and a half.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent may I ask the gentleman a question? It is now about half past 12. Four hours and a half of general debate would run to at least 5 o'clock, and perhaps a little later. Is it the expectation of the gentleman to go ahead under the five-minute rule this afternoon?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have no preference whatever about the matter. I wish to accede to the wishes of the leaders of the House, who have the management of the calendar. I have no preference.

Mr. MANN. Of course the gentleman knows it is Saturday afternoon.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I have no desire to press the bill beyond the stage of general debate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the road bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11686, with Mr. RUBEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11686, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11686) to provide that the United States shall, in certain cases, aid the States and the civil subdivisions thereof in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I am not at all well this morning and have not been for several days, and therefore I will not claim the attention of the House to discuss this bill at any great length.

This question is not a new question, but was recognized in the early history of this country. We all know that President Washington was greatly interested in the building of public roads and that the Cumberland Road was begun under the administration of Thomas Jefferson; that Henry Clay and John C. Calhoun also were active in their day on this great subject.

In the last platform of the Democratic Party, adopted at Baltimore, there is a distinct declaration in favor of Government aid to good roads. The declaration in the last national Democratic platform is:

We favor national aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads.

This, of course, is the last declaration of the Democratic Party on the subject, but it connects back with the work of the party, as I mentioned a moment ago, in the early history of this country.

I do not hesitate to say that, in my judgment, there is no question to-day before the American people in which the people themselves are more vitally interested. From every corner and part of this great Republic is coming the demand for this legislation; and we, as the servants of the people, owe no higher duty than to respond to the wishes of the people whom we represent, wherever their wishes are plainly and definitely known. That has always been my policy and my purpose since I have had the honor to be a Member of this House, and I expect to continue to speak and to vote the sentiments of my people so long as they continue to honor me by keeping me here as their Representative. The widespread interest in road building is shown by the following table of expenditures in the States:

Estimated appropriations and expenditures, by States, for year 1912.

This statement shows that every State in this Union is spending money for this purpose, and there is no purpose for which we can expend the public money that will, in my judgment, bring greater results to the people or contribute more to their happiness and their prosperity than the improvement of public roads. When we furnish the means of transportation or communication between the people in their neighborhoods and in their immediate communities and vicinities and, in addition, open up the highways that lead to the marts of trade and to the centers throughout this country, we carry to each and every man, woman, and child in this great Republic to some extent the prosperity, blessings, comfort, and happiness that exist in every part of this great Commonwealth.

In addition to that, there is no greater source of prosperity than to increase the value of the land in the country, because the land, as we all know, is the source of all prosperity, for from it must come the products that produce the wealth of the Republic.

It is well known to everyone present that wherever the good road has gone it has added to the value of the lands and brought them up to what they are really worth, oftentimes when they were priced below their intrinsic value by reason of the fact that the owners of the land did not have means of communication with the points of trade and with the centers where their products could be marketed.

In addition to this, good roads reduce the cost of transportation. I will give you a succinct illustration. When I was at home recently I sat in my office in the courthouse in the little city in which I live, and coming in around the corner of the courthouse yard I noticed 12 wagons, one behind another, with 2 ordinary mules hitched to each one of the wagons, and on each wagon there were 5 bales of cotton, 60 bales in all pulled by these 24 small mules. The average load for a pair of mules on the ordinary dirt roads in the wintertime in our section of the country is 2 bales of cotton. The increase in the number of bales which they were able to haul by reason of the fact that they had come in over a newly constructed gravel road which had just been put in operation was 36—that is, 60 bales instead of 24—for those 12 pairs of small mules, with a consequent reduction in the transportation cost of one of the great products of this country. [Applause.]

Before any Member votes against this bill let me remind him that it is intended to improve the post roads over which 42,000 rural letter carriers travel to carry the mail to 20,000,000 people living in the country, and to improve these roads will help every one of these 20,000,000 people and thereby benefit all the people.

Let me further remind you that we have spent for rivers and harbors since 1875 $592,395,000; for public buildings, $213,376,000; for the Panama Canal, about $375,000,000; and for various other objects enormous sums, and the farmers of this country have produced the wealth to sustain these enormous expenditures. Now, let us help them by giving them good roads. [Applause.]

I introduced a bill for good roads, proposing to appropriate $20,000,000 a year for five years to cooperate with the States, counties, and road districts. I like that bill, but this bill contains cooperative features and is the consensus of the Committee on Roads after considering all bills on the subject; therefore let us put it through and enact it into law and commit Congress to the idea of road building, and if this does not in practice work out all right we will amend it at the proper time. Now is the time for everybody who favors good roads to stand together and present a solid front. Let there be no division, and victory will crown our efforts and good roads be assured. [Applause.]

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE.]

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, while I do not think this is a perfect bill or that it will work out as successfully in aiding the farmer as its proponents believe, and while it is evident that the scheme of proportioning appropriations under it will eventually operate in favor of the States of larger area as against the States of greater population, I expect to vote for it.

The report of the Committee on Roads, showing the maximum amount of Federal aid to each State under the provisions of this bill, presents some interesting contrasts. Connecticut, with a population almost equal to that of Nebraska, because of a less amount of post-road mileage, would obtain under this bill a maximum appropriation of $208,750, as against $506,250 for Nebraska. It is assumed that Connecticut's road capacity is more nearly reached and completed than that of Nebraska, and that, therefore, future appropriations would operate more generously toward Nebraska than they would toward Connecticut. The same might be said of Pennsylvania and Texas, the former of which has about twice the population of the latter; for, while the mileage of the two States is given at 575,000 and 593,750, respectively, the presumption is that the expansion of post roads in Texas will hereafter be far greater than in Pennsylvania. Yet, as the committee presents the matter, Pennsylvania, by reason of both population and post-road mileage, would for the first year be entitled to $1,623,750, as against $1,126,250 for Texas. I assume, therefore, that the present favorable showing of the committee in apportioning what appears to be a large amount for Pennsylvania is not a fair indication of the relative size of appropriations in the future.

It is proposed to try on this new experiment with a total appropriation of $25,000,000 the first year, apportioning it amongst the States that desire to participate by making appropriations in like amount, in proportions adjusted to the population and the total number of miles of rural post roads. Large discretionary powers are conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture not only to deal with State officials, but to designate roads and to determine the manner of construction and maintenance. All this is to be done subject to Federal appropriations, which are not to exceed $15 per mile on ordinary dirt roads, $30 per mile on shell or gravel roads, and $60 per mile on macadam roads or others of higher grade. In addition, bridges and culverts along the line of these respective roads are to be improved and maintained within the rate fixed. It is evident that the highways of the cities will not derive any benefit from this bill; indeed, the act specifies "construction and maintenance of rural post roads" only. Whatever has been spent upon urban streets and highways may thus be counted as a charge against those who paid for them, nor is there any intent, though urban streets and highways be used as post roads, to provide in this act for their future construction or maintenance. The bill contemplates appropriations for rural post roads, and for rural post roads only.

Under these conditions the bill is not fair to all the taxpayers of the country, because it makes one set of taxpayers who have already paid for good roads join in the payment of good roads for others. The State which has already built its roads at State expense is expected to contribute to the construction and maintenance of roads in other States of larger area which have not been so fortunate. It must be admitted, however, that a long step forward has been taken in this bill in providing that the Federal Government shall not appropriate any money for the construction of good roads in any State unless that State is first prepared to contribute a like amount. This cooperative feature is desirable and tends in a degree to turn back to the State of larger area at least an equal share in the responsibility of road construction.

An objection to the bill which has thus far not been satisfactorily explained in general debate is revealed in the apparent insufficiency of the Federal aid for road construction on the per-mile basis. It is palpably impossible to build macadam roads for $60 per mile, plus a like contribution by the State, and it is extremely improbable that roads of a less grade could be built, with the maintenance of bridges and culverts included, for the amounts per mile set down in this bill. However, this and other questions may subsequently be cleared up in the discussion.

As I view it, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the inequalities of the bill, it is intended to improve our transportation facilities and to aid in the commendable work of bringing the city and the country closer together. If the city taxpayer is not to derive any financial benefit from the measure, he can at least content himself with the thought that an effort is being made to get the produce of the farm to the dinner table cheaper than before. If the bill brings about such a result, it will be a good thing for all of us, whether we live in the cities or whether we live upon the farm. I am not in favor of the Government ownership of railroads, and for the present I oppose the construction of Government railroads in Alaska, believing the $35,000,000 which it is intended to expend there could better be spent upon internal improvements in the United States. But I believe it is essential that the Government should aid in every way possible the improvement of our transportation facilities. I strongly favor liberal appropriations for the development and maintenance of interstate waterways as free avenues for commerce. They do and will cheapen transportation costs. Government aid may therefore be consistently urged for public roads coming within the purview of the Constitution, more especially as they are corollary to both railways and waterways, and if united would materially reduce the general expenses of transportation.

By wagon roads, such as are contemplated in the bill now before us, the cost of carriage per ton-mile is generally quoted by experts at 25 cents. By rail the cost is approximately 7 mills per ton-mile, by water it is 1 to 3 mills per ton-mile, and on the ocean it is one-half of a mill. If the farmer primarily pays this tremendous wagon-road cost of transportation to get his produce to the railroad or to the river bank for transshipment, the consumer in the city pays it eventually, and his cost of living is increased to that extent. And so far as transportation charges are concerned, that increase in the cost of living in the city is likely to continue until we have improved methods of transportation via both the waterway and the good road. Therefore anything we can do to reduce the transportation cost of commodities by earth roads, rail, or waterway—the latter being the cheapest of all transportation mediums—will be of direct benefit to both producer and consumer. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of any kind of reasonable legislation, State or National, which will result in permanent improvement of the highways of the United States. The question of Government aid in the construction and maintenance of post roads is no longer a mooted question. The party in power is pledged by its platform declaration to favor national aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads. The pending bill undertakes to provide Government aid to the rural post roads. It is not ventured to provide assistance for any road about which there could be a constitutional question raised. The Constitution of the United States provides for the establishment of post offices and post roads, and this by implication carries with it the right to construct and maintain such post roads. This is the first bill which has been presented providing for the aid in the construction of roads about which the constitutional question has not been raised.

I congratulate the author of this bill, my colleague, Mr. SHACKLEFORD, in his presentation of a scheme which avoids the raising of the question of his right under the Constitution to enact such a law. The pending bill is based upon the theory that the local community should cooperate with the National Government and provide at least an amount equally as large as that which is furnished by the United States Government. It is a very difficult thing to work out a scheme of cooperation which will be satisfactory to all the States, because hardly two States of the Union have the same system with reference to the construction and maintenance of their highways. In some States at present aid is given by the State to the county or civil division, while in others the whole burden of road building is borne by the local community. In some States there are highway commissions which control the building and maintenance of the roads of the States. In others there is a system of county supervision, with county highway engineers, who have supervision of the roads of the county. In other States they have both the State supervision and State highway engineer and county supervision with a county highway engineer, and each is expected to work in unison with the other. In order to meet all of these conditions it is impossible at present to provide a law with complete details, so as to fit into the conditions existing in the State.

It is usually conceded that primarily the State and local authorities have jurisdiction over the roads that have been located, and that the jurisdiction of the State should not be disturbed by any attempted control of the Federal Government; that whatever aid may be extended by the General Government should be accepted by the State, and no supervision should be assumed by the General Government which should in any way interfere with the local control by the State. In other words, it is not the purpose of this legislation nor of the party in control to so enact legislation as to in any way interfere with the State's jurisdiction over its own highways, but it is intended to provide a system of aid to the various States which are disposed to meet the conditions which are imposed by the General Government, none of which conditions will take from the State any of its jurisdiction over the roads of the State.

It is very difficult to frame a bill so as to make a proper distribution of the assistance that may be rendered by the General Government. The pending bill perhaps as nearly as any suggestion that has been made brings about an equitable adjustment of the aid that is to be extended. It provides that the money that may be expended by the General Government in any State in any fiscal year shall be determined in the following manner: One half is to be paid in the proportion which the total population of such State bears to the total population of all the States as shown by the next preceding Federal census, and the other half is to be distributed in the proportion which the total number of miles of rural post roads in use in any State bears to the total number of miles of rural post roads in use in all of the States as shown by the report of the Postmaster General at the close of the second quarter of the last preceding fiscal year. It will be seen by this provision that it is based one-half on population and one-half on the miles of post roads. On December 1, 1913, there were 42,961 rural roads, with an aggregate length of 1,042,477 miles. Of this aggregate number of miles it would be proper to make reduction of about 15 per cent for the number of miles that is traveled within corporate limits, where the roads are controlled by municipalities, and without corporate limits, where in making the aggregate length of a route there is a retrace over the same route or travel over another route. This would reduce the actual number of miles of rural post roads to about 870,000 miles.

There is an impression abroad that this bill will provide assistance for every mile of rural post roads; in other words, the 870,000 miles of road. This is entirely erroneous, as the bill only provides assistance to certain roads, which are classified by the bill into three classes: Class A, which is to embrace roads upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a rock track composed of macadam or other material of equal utility or cost, constructed and maintained in such manner that it shall have a smooth, firm surface; class B to embrace roads upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track composed of shells, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay or other material of equal utility but less expensive than macadam, constructed and maintained in such manner that it shall have a smooth, firm surface; class C is to embrace roads upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the topography of the locality, with adequate drainage and ample side ditches, with a roadway constructed so as to quickly shed water into the side ditches and kept crowned and compacted by dragging or other adequate means so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles. In other words, the three classes embrace, first, macadam roads; second, gravel or shell roads; and, third, earth roads; in each case the road to be well constructed and in good condition.

According to the latest report of the Public Roads Office in the Agricultural Department, there are at present 52,585 miles of class A, 161,790 miles of class B, and 222,513 miles of class C. If no roads were added to any of these classes during the next fiscal year, then the amount that could be appropriated under the pending bill would be $11,300,000. In other words, there are at present, according to the estimates of the Agricultural Department, only 435,888 miles of roads which could be benefited by the provisions of this bill, and about the same number of miles of post roads in the United States would not be benefited by the provisions of this bill, because the roads do not belong to any one of the three classes. I wish to impress this fact that under this bill a road, in order to secure the benefits of the aid proposed, must come within the three classes. It must be either a good macadam road, shell road, or dirt road before it is entitled to any recognition by the Federal Government. This is seriously objected to by some individuals, because they insist that all post roads should have assistance from the Federal Government. I am in full accord with the principle of this bill in that regard, because I believe that the local community ought to show interest enough to bring itself within the requirements of law before it should receive national aid. This feature, instead of being condemned as it is by many, ought to be commended, it seems to me, because it will have the effect of encouraging the local community to be more interested in road building and to place its roads in position to receive the benefit which this bill, if enacted into law, would give them.

This bill provides that all roads of class A, or macadam roads, may receive aid to the extent of not exceeding $60 per mile, and that the roads of class B, gravel or shell roads, may receive benefit to the extent of $30 per mile, and that the roads of class C, or the earth roads, may receive benefits to the extent of $15 per mile. I am inclined to the view that there is too much disparity in these classes, or, in other words, where a dirt road has placed itself within the provisions of class C it ought to be entitled to more consideration at the hands of the Federal Government than that which this bill provides. I would be pleased to see it increased to at least $25 per mile, but as I am advised this schedule of rates is a compromise and that no other schedule will meet as nearly unanimous support of this House, so that it becomes necessary to support this provision if persons are favorable to the legislation in general.

I called attention a moment ago to the fact that this bill did not provide that all rural post roads should receive the benefit of Government aid. The language of the bill is—

That certain roads in the States which are adapted to use by the United States as rural post roads shall be divided into three classes, to be known as class A, class B, and class C.

Certain roads. Now, that word "certain" is nowhere defined in this bill as I understand it. The word "certain" may, however, be explained by the Agricultural Department in the estimate which it has submitted of the miles that are found in class C. If there are only 222,513 miles in class C, then only about one-fourth of the dirt post roads are provided for, and many believe that this bill should provide for all dirt post roads. Now, if you will make the computation, you will ascertain that you can provide for all the roads, if that is the intention, provided the remaining roads all belong to class C.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. LLOYD. Certainly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The gentleman comments upon the words "certain roads." Those words were intended to convey the idea that the roads to be embraced are the roads that are up to class A, B, or C, and is intended to exclude all roads that are not up to those classes. That is the purpose of those words.

Mr. LLOYD. If that be true, then I am trying to call attention to the fact that over 600,000 miles of dirt roads in the United States now used as post roads will not be provided for by this bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If the gentleman will permit an interruption, I will assure him that he is mistaken about that.

Mr. LLOYD. All right.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. This bill provides that at the end of each fiscal year the governor of the State shall file a statement showing what of these roads have been brought within these classes. The fact which the gentleman is commenting on is that there is now only a certain mileage of roads in class C, but the purpose of this bill is to induce the people to increase the mileage of roads in class C, and at the end of the fiscal year they will have not only the roads now enumerated as being within class C, but all of the roads that have been brought within the provisions of either A, B, or C, as provided by this bill, will be reported as coming within the provisions of this act, and will receive compensation.

If it provided that only the benefits of this bill should go to the roads in existence, there would be no need for the bill. We want to encourage the construction of additional roads and the improvement of those now in existence. The bill provides that all roads hereafter to be built that come within these provisions shall come within the benefits of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman does not intend now to provide for all the rural post roads in the country; he only intends to provide for those specifically in class A, which amount to 58,000 miles; class B, 161,000 miles; and class C, which amount to 222,000 miles, and that hereafter, if the people of the United States actually construct roads and place them so that they may be classed as A, B, or C, they will be entitled to compensation under the bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That is the purpose, that no part of the money should go for a road that was not improved up to the extent at least of class C. Every mile that is brought up to class C will, at the end of the fiscal year, be included in the compensation which is provided for here. If no road is under improvement, if it is a mud road, if it is impassable a large part of the year, and no money spent on it by the local community, it is not intended for this bill to be a pork-barrel proposition and furnish money for the keeping of bad roads. It is to stimulate the roads, to bring them up to the standard of class C, when they can receive compensation under the bill.

Mr. LLOYD. Under the provisions of this bill the State of Missouri, which we both in part represent, would hardly receive but a small per cent of benefit from this bill, because all of our dirt roads do not come up to the provisions of class C, as I understand it. I do not believe that 25 per cent of the dirt roads in Missouri will come up to this standard. The State of Indiana and like States, who have good roads, will be the States that will get the greatest benefit of this fund.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I will yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to call my colleague's attention to the fact that this bill, while it says that it is for the aid, construction, and maintenance of post roads in its title, and purports to be carrying out the Democratic platform, promising aid for post roads, is not, when analyzed, found to apply to post roads at all. The only application to post roads in this bill is the definition that one-half of the money shall be distributed in the proportion which the total number of miles of rural post roads in a State bears to the total number of miles in rural post roads in all the States. There is no provision in this bill that these routes upon which the rental is to apply shall be used as post roads. It speaks of certain roads adapted to use as post roads, but it does not include all the post roads in the United States. If it did, they would have framed a different bill. It would have been placed under the Post Office Department instead of under the Agricultural Department. The post-roads proposition is named in the bill for the purpose of distributing the money, and there is no provision that the roads so used shall be improved.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think that the bill is so drawn as to apply to post roads.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Certainly.

Mr. LAZARO. I would like to get the gentleman's idea of a dirt road which comes under class C.

Mr. LLOYD. I think the bill describes it.

Mr. LAZARO. But what is the gentleman's idea? He says that many of the dirt roads in his State would not come in under it.

Mr. LLOYD. The bill provides for roads under class C, as follows:

> Class C shall embrace roads upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with adequate drainage and ample side ditches, with a roadway constructed so as to quickly shed water into the side ditches and kept crowned and compacted by dragging or other adequate means so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles.

Mr. LAZARO. Let me ask the gentleman—are the roads in his State graded?

Mr. LLOYD. Not as they ought to be. I do not think they would come under this class. I believe that most of the roads in Missouri would not come under any of these classes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The Legislature of Missouri, at the last session, passed a law giving $15 a mile for county and State roads, which requires them to come within class C. I have a telegram from the State highway commissioner saying that, from the 29th of March to the 1st day of October of this last year, 10,043 miles of road were brought within the provisions of class C and are now within the provisions of class C.

Mr. LLOYD. Well, 10,000 miles of road is a small part of the mileage of Missouri.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. But if 10,000 miles can be improved and brought within this class in 7 months, how many can you improve and bring within it in 12 months, after we give this added stimulation?

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I am trying to reach a conclusion at the present time as to the roads that are provided for in this bill. If all the post roads in the United States were improved in the next year, every such road in the United States will come under the provisions of the bill. At the present time I am calling the attention of the House to the fact that only a very small percentage of the dirt roads of the western country—the Mississippi Valley country—are within the provisions of this bill.

Now, I want to call attention to another matter.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Certainly.

Mr. DYER. Does that class include the Boonslick Road that runs through Missouri?

Mr. LLOYD. I think it would include a part of it. There are two ways of getting this money; one is through the State authorities in connection with the Secretary of Agriculture. The question was asked last night several times, Are you in favor of an interstate road, the great State highway? Nearly every man who answered said that he was opposed to an interstate highway. My colleague, Mr. BORLAND, was not present, and that accounts for the fact that we did not hear a discordant note. This bill, as I understand it—every dollar of the money that would go to the State of Missouri can be applied, if agreed to by the State authorities and the Secretary of Agriculture, to the construction of the road that our colleague, Mr. BORLAND, wants from St. Louis to Kansas City, the great automobile road.

This is not a perfect bill, and in many respects I think it might be changed so as to materially improve it, but it seems to be the very best that can be done at the present time. All legislation must necessarily be the result of compromise, and I am advised by those in charge of the bill that the best has been done that could be to reach a conclusion as to the provisions of the bill which would best satisfy the various Members of the House. Personally I do not oppose the interstate highways.

If the automobile people can secure their construction, the roads when constructed will be of great benefit to the American people. I do not oppose the great State highways extending from one large city to another. I am not in opposition to the inter-county highways which extend from county seat to county seat, as provided by the laws of the State of Missouri. I am in full sympathy with any kind of scheme, without unusual burdens either to the National Government or State or local government, that will result in material improvement of the roads of the country. I am more interested, however, in the improvement of the ordinary dirt road which leads into the small towns of the country than I am in the improvement of the great highways. But I do not mean by that I have any word of censure against those who are trying to secure great thoroughfares of the best macadam. The better the road is the better it is for the people, and while our people generally can not have macadam roads, yet I am anxious that they shall have the best possible road that can be secured for their localities. I would be pleased to see every post road in the United States a splendid highway that could be easily classed in one of the classes proposed by this bill. I am gratified to see awakening sentiment of the country on the subject of road building. I am proud of the fact that to-day no State has more of such sentiment than the State which I in part represent. The good-roads spirit prevails everywhere, and I am hopeful that in the near future it may be said that Missouri has the best roads of any State in the Union, but I realize to accomplish this result there must be a vast outlay of money and energy, for while Missouri is developing its roads it may be safely stated that other States will not want to fall behind in this march of progress. I am anxious to see good roads, especially for the benefit of the farmer, that he may be placed in touch with his schools, his church, his market, and in that way be identified with everything that is necessary for his material development and the prosperity and happiness of himself and the people of his community.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON].

[Mr. DICKINSON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH].

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the subcommittee on the District of Columbia of the Committee on Appropriations I found some men on that committee who were opposed to the improvement of Seventh Street in the city of Washington, and I find that now they are very heartily in favor of this committee bill or any other good-roads bill that may be presented to the House. When I asked those gentlemen why they favored the good-roads proposition as presented in this committee bill and opposed the improvement of Seventh Street in the District of Columbia, they replied that they did not have to run for Congress in the District of Columbia.

It is estimated that the cost of wagon transportation per ton-mile in this country is about 23 cents and about 9 cents in France, which would make a difference in wagon transportation in the United States of approximately 14 cents a mile.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman state what member of the Good Roads Committee it was who said that he did not have to run for Congress on Seventh Street, in the District of Columbia?

Mr. HINEBAUGH. I will say to the gentleman that I will be very glad to have a conversation with him upon that subject in the cloakroom at some time. I do not feel that I care to use the name of the gentleman who made that remark, because it was made in the form of a jest.

Mr. BARNHART. I thought so.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINEBAUGH. However, the statement is absolutely true as the gentleman knows.

Mr. BARNHART. I do not know anything about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. HINEBAUGH. I yield for a question; yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, how is it that the titular leader of the Progressives would go into a cloakroom to discuss a public matter, after he has advocated publicity in all things, caucuses, committees, legislation, and everything? I am surprised, and I am sure the House and the country will be surprised.

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I really have not sufficient time to explain to my reactionary friend from Kansas why I would do that thing, but if he will listen to the falling of the ballots in November he will understand why we Progressives in this Congress, in response to a sentiment which we believe exists in the country, refuse to go into secret-committee hearings and secret caucuses, and I do not know that these cloakrooms are secret at all. I supposed they were open—at least to every member of every committee in the House, and I will say to my friend that if he will come into the cloakroom while the gentleman from Indiana and I are discussing this matter we will continue the discussion in his presence.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But this is a public place, and this is the place for the discussion of public questions, and not the cloakroom.

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I do not wonder that my good friend from Kansas is a little bit anxious about secret committee meetings and secret caucuses. In fact, for any man who realizes and knows what the sentiment of this country at this time is, and who expects to test that sentiment in the near future, it is natural that he should be anxious about this subject. However, I desire to say a few words about the question of good roads.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Iowa to yield me some more time.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. HINEBAUGH. America leads the world in invention, in railroads, telephones, and telegraph, and yet is at the foot of the class in the most important means of communication—the public road.

Less than 10 per cent of American roads are improved.

It has taken us 140 years to realize the extreme importance to the progress and prosperity of our country of road building on a national scale. The State of Illinois, which I have the honor in part to represent, has an area of 56,002 square miles; 90.7 per cent of the land in Illinois is in farms and 86 per cent is improved. Illinois has 94,141 miles of road, or 4.28 per cent of the total road mileage in the Union. Our rural population will average 22 per mile.

Our postal receipts are $27,942,127.30, or 11.55 per cent of the total. In spite of all this, Illinois would get approximately $112,000 on that basis if this bill becomes a law. This would be a mere pittance for our State; but because it is a step in the right direction I shall vote for the bill.

There are 2,300,000 miles of public roads in the United States. Everyone now believes that it is essential to the development of our country that these roads should be improved, but we do not by any means agree on the plan to be adopted. There are many sincere advocates of what is known as the "national-highway" plan. They contend the Government should build, pay for, and maintain national highways, and they argue that joint appropriations and joint control will not produce good roads, either in construction or maintenance, and they point to the fact that many States have given up the State-aid plan and adopted the State-highway idea. There are other equally sincere advocates of good-road legislation who believe in Federal aid or reward both for county, State, and national road building.

Doubtless every Member of this House who spent his boyhood days on the farm, and by reason of that fact knows what it means to a farmer to attempt to market the products of his farm at a distance of 5 or 10 miles over rough, muddy, or sandy roads, will favor almost any plan which tends to better such conditions, and would therefore be loath to vote against almost any of the many bills which during the last three or four years have been introduced by various Members of the House.

The bill under consideration, House bill 11686, while containing many excellent features, is not, in my judgment, in any way comparable to the bill of Congressman WOODRUFF, of Michigan, House bill 10404, which establishes a bureau of postal highways in the Post Office Department, and which provides that the bureau shall cooperate with the various States and Territories in the construction, improvement, and maintenance of permanent public roads which are now or may be hereafter utilized by the Government as post roads.

The Woodruff bill provides for a director of the bureau, who shall be a practical engineer of road construction, and also for inspectors of postal highways, not to exceed 50 in number, who shall be appointed after competitive examination, and requires them to inspect the roads which may be constructed and report to the director of the bureau of postal highways their findings as to each mile of road inspected; and, in addition to this inspection, provision is made requiring all rural mail and star-route carriers to inspect rural post roads and to report on blanks to be furnished by the Post Office Department once each month as to the condition of the rural post roads over which they travel in the discharge of their duties.

It is true that both of these bills are based on the theory of road construction by the Federal aid or reward plan. Those who favor the national highway proposition, in opposition to the Federal-aid plan, insist that if we want good market roads, and if we desire to remove this question from politics and the danger of graft, the Federal-aid plan must be dropped and the national highway theory substituted.

The good road draws to its neighborhood good farms and good homes. Good crops are worth while when they can be easily taken to market. The effect of good roads in any community is to lure the city boy into the country and to keep the country boy on the farm. It is a sign of culture, knowledge, and civilization in a county, State, or Nation. It has been well said that "if a country is stagnant the condition of the roads will invariably indicate the fact; if a people have no roads, they are savages."

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, the economic value of good roads and the necessity for building them are self-evident. They need no further argument. The statistical data and all phases of their value have already been discussed and unanimously indorsed by this House.

Everybody knows that in the United States it costs, on an average, twice as much to haul farm products from the farm to the nearest railroad station as it costs to transport the same products from that station to Liverpool, England. All of us know that the farmer in this, as in other matters, has received scant consideration by the Government, and that he deserves the best. But the value of good roads is not confined to the farmer. It mightily affects all classes of society, all lines of industry, and the stability and the perpetuity of the Government. The demand is immediate, unequivocal, and impelling. The administration has promised to inaugurate this far-reaching plan of service to the whole country. All political parties seem glad to join in a movement that will improve the living conditions of every citizen and have a powerful influence upon the happiness and patriotism of all the people.

I am a Democrat in every sense of that word. I had some humble part in the election of the present great Democratic President. I am more convinced now than in that campaign that in the generations to come he will be numbered among the immortals of the Republic, because he has shown himself a man of no petty or ignoble passions, a man of unusual character and uncommon purity, whose lofty ambition is constantly flashing forth in the highest type of a patriot's love for the man on the ground, for the uplift and recognition of the great plain people of the country upon whom all others depend.

All political parties here recognize that this bill is in harmony with the spirit of service that permeates the life and purposes of this administration.

The same principles underlie this bill as are the foundation of public education and all other governmental enterprises for the common good of society and humanity. All the wealth of the country is taxed to pay for these enterprises and all the wealth of the country should be taxed for the purpose of building roads for the rich and the poor, for the city man and the country man, without reference to the financial standing of either. The progressive city man is as much concerned in building the country roads to the home of the farmer as is the farmer himself. The city man's property should be taxed to build the country road.

The recognition of this principle makes road building not only a State but a Federal question, and one that deserves and demands ready and liberal support by this Government. There is no competition between the city and the country. The rural and the urban citizen are to be the thoroughbreds of the centuries as they go hand in hand down the ages, each profiting by the prosperity of the other, and each gladly lifting the burden from the other, as they together work out the destinies of the Nation in establishing easy and universal communication among all classes of society, universal fellowship and brotherhood among men, universal love and willing service for humanity, and patriotic devotion by all the people for all American institutions.

Permanent public roads have been in all ages and are to be in this country the direct means of bringing all the people into sympathetic touch with one another for greater industrial activity and commercial prosperity; for a higher intelligence and a happier existence, finally culminating in that unified citizenship necessary for the perpetuity of the Republic.

These are the principles upon which this bill is founded. All agree that they are sound. The remaining question is the method of procedure. The general cooperative plan of the bill is correct, but if I had my way the amount appropriated would be a hundred millions instead of twenty-five. Every county seat in each State would have a permanent road connecting it with every other county seat in that State and lateral permanent roads would reach the farmers of the rural sections of each State and thus bring the farms into easy and harmonious communication with the cities and towns of the country. Why should not we spend millions at our doors when the demand is so urgent? We build roads and streets in Panama. We expend millions for the Panama Canal and for the islands of the seas, for railroads in Alaska, for the Diplomatic Service in foreign lands, for the Army and Navy, for pensions without number, and for a thousand other nonproductive enterprises. These expenditures may be defensible, but to neglect the people at home by failing to appropriate liberally for this great constructive work would be utterly indefensible. Let our first effort be for the people at home.

Let us no longer follow the example of the colt that drowned himself in an effort to swim the river to get a drink of water on the other side.

Although this appropriation for roads should be multiplied by 4, because it is so imperatively needed and because it is the one expenditure of the public funds that will reach every man, woman, and child in the country, yet I am heartily for this bill as it now stands. It is the best that can be done now, and opens the way by stimulation and encouragement to a new life, a new prosperity, and a new type of patriotic devotion by all the people to American institutions. I earnestly urge the immediate passage of this bill. It dovetails perfectly with the Louisiana road laws and will greatly encourage our people in their efforts for better roads. Louisiana is raising $2,000,000 annually for roads, and has the best road laws in the land. For the benefit of other States I attach them herewith to this address.

Act No. 49—House bill No. 89.

An act to require the State board of engineers to assume control of State highways under certain conditions; to elect a State highway engineer; to define his powers and duties and fix his compensation; to authorize the construction and maintenance of highways by contract or by the highway engineer; to provide for the working of convicts on highways under certain regulations; to authorize the acquisition, by expropriation or otherwise, of rights of way for highways, drainage canals, or ditches; to provide a revenue for carrying out the objects and purposes of this act, and to provide for the disbursement thereof; and to require the parishes, cities, towns, and villages to contribute a certain proportion of the costs of constructing and maintenance of highways; defining a State highway; and repealing all laws or parts of laws in conflict with this act.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, That the State board of engineers, whenever called on so to do by the police juries of the parishes or the municipal authorities of cities, towns, and villages shall furnish the different road districts, parishes, cities, towns, and villages with plans and specifications for public roads, and such assistance and advice as will tend to create a uniform system of public roads throughout the State. In order to more fully accomplish this end the State board of engineers are hereby authorized and required to select or appoint a competent engineer and fix his compensation, which shall not exceed the sum of $5,000 per annum, who is schooled in highway construction or engineering, to take charge of and construct public roads when authorized to do so by the State board of engineers or upon the request of any of the parochial or municipal authorities, as will hereinafter be provided.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, etc., That such person thus selected as provided in section 1 of this act shall be known as the State highway engineer, and he shall, before entering upon the duties required of him by this act, and assigned him by the State board of engineers, take an oath to faithfully discharge the duties imposed upon him and execute a bond with solvent surety in favor of the governor of the State of Louisiana in a sum not less than $10,000, which bond shall be approved by the State board of engineers. He shall hold his office during the pleasure of the State board of engineers. The State board of engineers shall appoint, in its discretion, such assistant engineers and such other help as may be necessary to the proper conduct of the work of establishing, constructing, maintaining, and repairing public highways with the bridges, culverts, drains, and other appurtenances and accessories incident thereto. The office of the State highway engineer shall be with the State board of engineers, and shall at all times be under its supervision, and the said State board of engineers shall provide such officer with suitable office rooms and with such clerical help as may be necessary to discharge the duties of his office.

SEC. 3. Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be the duty of the said board of State engineers to hold meetings at such times and for such periods as it may deem essential for the proper carrying out of the provisions of this act.

It shall be the duty of the said board to consider at its meetings all questions relating to the general policy of the State highway system and for the conduct of the work in general; to receive and consider, at such times as it may select, the reports of the State highway engineer and to act in all matters relating to recommendations, estimates, and appropriations which it may be found advisable to submit to the governor.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, etc., That the State highway engineer shall have charge of all records pertaining to the State highway system, same to be filed and retained in the office of the State board of engineers; shall keep a record of all purchases and orders relating to the business of his office; shall keep on file copies of plans and specifications and estimates prepared by his office. He shall cause to be made and kept a general highway plan of the State, and shall collect information and compile statistics relative to the mileage, character, and condition of the State highways and bridges in the different parishes, cities, towns, and villages of the State. He shall investigate and determine the methods of road construction best adapted to various sections of the State, and shall establish standards for the construction and maintenance of State highways in the various parishes, giving due regard to the topography, natural conditions, character and availability of road-building materials, and the ability of parishes, cities, towns, and villages to meet their portion of the cost of building and maintaining State highways under the provisions of this act. It shall be his duty in improving the highways of the State to pay special attention to the most important trunk roads, and where practicable to construct and maintain continuous lines of road for intra and inter state traffic. He may at all times be consulted by parish, city, town, and village officials having authority over highways and bridges relative to any questions relating to such highways and bridges. He shall determine the character and have the general supervision of the construction and repair of all highways improved under the provisions of this act, subject to the approval of the said board of State engineers. He shall report all the proceedings of his office to the board of State engineers at such periods as they may designate.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted etc., That whenever the police jury of any parish, the mayor or governing authority of cities, towns, or villages of the State, shall decide that any main traveled road or roads in such parish, city, town, or village should be improved or constructed under the provisions of this act, they shall make written application to the State highway engineer for State aid in making the proposed road. Upon receipt of such application the State highway engineer shall send to the president of such police jury, the mayor, or other governing authority of cities, towns, or villages a blank form for the purpose of eliciting such information as may be desired concerning the proposed road improvement, which blank form said president of said police jury, mayor, or other governing authority shall fill out to the best of his ability and return to the said State highway engineer. If the said State highway engineer shall be satisfied that the proposed improvement will be upon a main traveled road or of public utility and convenience, and that the parish, city, town, or village shall be able to meet its portion of the cost of such improvement, the State highway engineer may approve the same and undertake said work of improvement with the approval of the said board of State engineers, in accordance with the provisions of this act, and said State highway engineer or one of his assistants shall proceed to view said road or part thereof proposed to be improved, and shall make all necessary surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates of cost of its construction out of such materials as may be determined by said State highway engineer. For improvements to cost $2,000 or less, it shall be discretionary with the State highway engineer, with the approval of the board of State engineers, to execute such work of improvement himself or to allow the parish, city, town, or village to do the work, or to let the same by contract. Where the cost of the proposed improvements is to exceed $2,000 it shall be the duty of the State highway engineer to advertise for bids to do the work, according to the plans and specifications prepared therefor, in one or more newspapers having a circulation in each parish, city, town, or village in which said proposed highway lies for a period of 3 weeks when such advertisement is in a weekly paper and for 15 days when in a daily paper, and such advertisement shall also be published in one or more daily papers of a general circulation throughout the State for a period of 15 days. Such advertisement shall state the place where the bidder may inspect the plans and specifications, the place where the bids will be received, and the time and place for opening the same. Every such bid shall be accompanied by a certified check of the bidder in an amount equal to 5 per cent of the amount of his bid, which check shall be forfeited to the State highway fund hereinafter provided for should the bidder to whom such contract is awarded fail to enter into a contract as required within 10 days after notice to do so from said State highway engineer. The checks of all unsuccessful bidders shall be returned after the contract is awarded and bond given. All bids so submitted shall be received at the office of the said State highway engineer, and shall be publicly opened and read at the time stated in said advertisement by him or in his presence. The president of the police jury of such parish, the mayor, or other governing authority of the city, town, or village in which said improvement is to be made and for which bids are submitted, shall be notified by the State highway engineer of the time fixed for opening said bids, and he or some other member of the said police jury, the mayor, or a member of the municipal board may be present at said opening of bids. The said State highway engineer shall have the right to reject any and all bids if in his opinion a good cause exists therefor, and may proceed to execute the work with his own force, employing such other means or agencies as are hereinafter provided, but otherwise he shall award the contract to the lowest responsible bidder, such award to be subject to the concurrence of the said police jury or of the mayor and council or other governing authority. The successful bidder shall be required to furnish bond of a surety company authorized to do business in Louisiana in a sum equal to one-half the amount of the contract awarded, conditioned that such work shall be performed in accordance with the plans, specifications, and the terms of the contract, and no party bidding for the work shall be accepted as surety on the required bond. When the contract is signed by the State highway engineer and the successful bidder with the written concurrence of the police jury, the mayor and council, or other governing authority a copy of the same, including the plans, specifications, and estimates of cost, shall be forthwith filed in the office of the said State highway engineer, with a like copy furnished to the said police jury, the mayor, or other governing authority, for filing in the office of such parochial or municipal board, and a copy to the successful bidder.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, etc., That all work of construction, improvement, and maintenance of highways under the provisions of this act shall be under the supervision and direction of the State board of engineers and shall be performed by the State highway engineer in accordance with the plans and specifications and contract prepared and executed therefor.

SEC. 7. Be it further enacted, etc., That the total cost of all work of highway construction, improvement, and maintenance under the provisions of this act shall be paid by the State treasurer upon the warrant of the State highway engineer, approved by the president of the board of State engineers, out of the fund hereafter created for the purposes of this act. The parish, city, town, or village wherein such work of improvement has been or is being performed shall refund to the State one-half of such total cost thereof. The portion of said cost to be borne by the parish, city, town, or village in which said highway improvement has been made shall be paid to the State treasurer by the treasurer of said parish upon the order of said police jury or by the treasurer of said city, town, or village upon the order of the mayor and council or other governing body. Upon the completion of any such contract for highway improvement the State highway engineer shall certify to the State treasurer and to the president of the police jury of the parish or the mayor or other governing authority of the town, city, or village wherein such work of improvement has been performed, the portion of the cost thereof to be borne by said parish or parishes, cities, towns, or villages, and if the portion of said parish or parishes, cities, towns, or villages, or either or any of them, shall not be paid to the State treasurer within 30 days after being so certified by the State highway engineer, then the portion of such parish, city, town, or village remaining unpaid shall be charged against said parish, city, town, or village, and no further State aid for highway improvement shall be granted said parish, city, town, or village until the amount due is fully paid, with legal interest from maturity, into the hands of the State treasurer to the credit of the State highway fund hereinafter created: Provided, That not more than $50,000 shall be used or apportioned by the State board of engineers to the building of such highways in any one parish during any one calendar year if other parishes have pending applications for State aid in highway construction under the terms of this act: And provided further, That no parish shall receive an apportionment or expenditure of said funds for more than one year when other parishes are applying for said funds.

SEC. 8. Be it further enacted, etc., That the State highway engineer may authorize partial payments to any contractor performing any highway improvement under the provisions of this act as the same progresses; but not more than 80 per cent of the contract price of the work as it is completed shall be paid in advance of the full completion and acceptance of such paid improvement; at least 20 per cent of the full contract of any such work or improvement shall be withheld until the work is satisfactorily completed, inspected, and accepted by the State highway engineer.

SEC. 9. Be it further enacted, etc., That the improvement of roads under the provisions of this act shall be taken up and carried forward in the respective parishes of the State, as far as practicable, in the order of the date of receipt of the applications therefor from the presidents of the police juries of the respective parishes, mayors, or other governing authorities of cities, towns, and villages, or as the State highway engineer may determine; but no parish, city, town, or village shall be entitled to receive State aid as provided in this act unless and until it shall be first made to appear to the State highway engineer that the money with which to meet the proportion of said expense to be borne by the parish, city, town, or village is either already in the hands of the parish, city, town, or village treasurer or will be so in hand and immediately available upon the completion and acceptance of said work of improvement.

SEC. 10. Be it further enacted, etc., That every contract for highway improvement to be made under the provisions of this act shall be made in the name of the State of Louisiana, signed by the State highway engineer and the contracting parties, with the written approval of the president of the police jury of the parish, or of the mayor or other governing authority of the city, town, or village wherein the work is to be done. No such contract for highway improvement shall be entered into by the State highway engineer, nor shall any such work be authorized under the provisions of this act, until the written concurrence therein of the police jury of the parish or parishes, or of the mayors or other governing authorities of the cities, towns, and villages, respectively, in which said proposed improvement is to be made, agreeing that such parish or parishes, cities, towns, or villages, respectively, will assume their proportion of the cost thereof, as hereinbefore provided, shall have been obtained and placed on file in the office of the board of State engineers.

SEC. 11. Be it further enacted, etc., That whenever any road shall be constructed or improved in any parish, city, town, or village under the provisions of this act or has heretofore been so constructed or improved under previous statutes relating to road improvement under which State aid has been granted, the State highway engineer shall thereafter keep all such roads in proper condition and repair, and the total cost of such maintenance shall be paid by the State treasurer, the said parish, city, town, or village to reimburse the State its proportional share of such total cost—one-half thereof—such payment and reimbursement to be made in like manner and as provided in section 7 hereof for the original cost of such highways.

The State treasurer is hereby authorized to pay, upon the warrant of said State highway engineer, approved by the president of the State board of engineers, such sums as may be required for the repair of such roads. It shall be the duty of the said State highway engineer to organize a system of continuous repair and inspection of State highways, so that the same will be in good condition at all times.

SEC. 12. Be it further enacted, etc., That no State highway shall be dug up or otherwise used for laying pipe lines, sewers, poles, wires, or railways, or for other purposes, without the written permit of the State highway engineer, and then only in accordance with the regulations prescribed by said engineer; and all such work shall be done under the supervision and to the satisfaction of said engineer, and all the cost of replacing the highway in as good condition as previous to its being disturbed shall be paid by the person to whom or in whose behalf such permit was given, or by the persons by whom the work was done. In case of immediate necessity therefor, a city, town, or village may dig up said State highway without such permit from said State highway engineer: Provided, That in such cases such highway shall be forthwith replaced in as good condition as before at the expense of such city, town, or village. No railway or trolley line shall be permitted within the right of way of any State highway except at crossings, and no trees on any State highways shall be used or be disturbed for the erection of electric lights, telephone, or telegraph lines. It shall be the duty of the State highway engineer, as far as practicable, to have State highways bordered by trees.

SEC. 13. Be it further enacted, etc., That the State highway engineer, with the approval of the State board of engineers, may purchase for the State all rock crushers, steam rollers, and other road machinery, tools, and implements and draft animals that may be needed for the purposes of this act, and such machinery shall be managed and used under the direction of said engineer, who shall employ competent men to operate and keep them in repair.

Said State highway engineer may purchase all necessary materials and supplies and incur such other expenses as may be necessary in the operation, maintenance, and transportation of all such road machinery, tools, and implements. Upon the application of the police jury of any parish, or of the mayor or other governing authority of any city, town, or village, said State highway engineer may furnish for use such road machinery when convenient and practicable for use in building or repairing any road or roads in such parish, city, town, or village, all expenses incurred thereby to be borne by said parish, city, town, or village.

SEC. 14. Be it further enacted, etc., That in all cases where it is necessary to acquire a right of way in constructing a new highway or changing the location of an old, the right of way thereof shall be acquired by the parish, city, town, or village, either by purchase, donation, or by expropriation under the general laws of the State relative to expropriation of private property for public purposes, in the event the owner of said property and the governing authorities of such cities, towns, or villages, or the State highway engineer should not agree upon the price thereof. In expropriating lands for the right of way the measure of damages to such landowner shall be double the assessed value of the property per acre appearing on the last assessment rolls. This measure of damages shall include the price of the land and all damages that may result to the owner: Provided, however, That if any improvements of the landowner or any crops upon the land are damaged or destroyed by the location of such highway, then he may recover additional compensation for the actual injury or destruction of such improvements or crops. After the State highway engineer has laid out a road over a certain tract of land, and actually commenced the construction of said highway thereon, the landowner shall not be entitled to prevent or retard the construction of the road by any legal process, but shall be remitted to an action for damages and recover such damages as is authorized under this act. All State highways shall be of such width as shall be fixed by the State highway engineer, and the rights of way authorized to be acquired under this act shall be of such width as may be designated by the State highway engineer as in his judgment is best suited to that particular locality. The State highway engineer shall also have the right and authority to have dug canals and ditches or drains sufficient, in his judgment, to properly drain the road being constructed through any lands of private individuals or corporations to drain the public roads. The right of way for such canals and ditches may be acquired in the same manner and for the same compensation as is herein provided for acquiring rights of way for highways. In the event the landowner should donate the right of way for the ditch or canal through his property then under such terms, restrictions, and regulations as may be imposed by the State highway engineer, he shall be permitted to drain into said ditch or canal. If, however, such private owner will not donate this right, it shall be left to the discretion of the State highway engineer whether he be permitted to drain into such ditch or canal under any conditions.

SEC. 15. Be it further enacted, etc., That the said State highway engineer, with the approval of the State board of engineers and the president of the police jury, or the mayor or governing authority of any city, town, or village, may exchange such land or part thereof upon which any highway is now located for another location for such highway, or he may sell such lands, when the highway has been abandoned, or may vacate any lands or part thereof or rights in lands which have been taken or acquired for road purposes under this act by executing and recording a deed therefor, and said vacation shall vest the title to the lands or rights so vacated in the persons, their heirs and assigns, who are named in said act.

SEC. 16. Be it further enacted, etc., That the said State highway engineer shall have the authority to employ any and all labor necessary when performing a contract for the construction or repair of public roads or performing the preliminary work of surveying, or performing any other work necessary in connection therewith, and when such labor is employed by the day he shall only pay the reasonable and customary price.

That in order to further carry out the provisions of this act and provide labor sufficient to construct and maintain the public roads as herein provided, the convicts of the State of Louisiana may be worked upon the said public roads as authorized by the constitution of the State. Whenever in the opinion of the State highway engineer convicts can be profitably worked upon the public roads he shall apply to the board of control of the State penitentiary, who shall furnish such convicts in case they are available. The labor performed by the convicts shall be furnished free of charge, provided, however, that the cost of maintenance and operation shall be borne by the parish, municipality, or road district having the work performed, and paid out of the fund available for said work. The board of control of the State penitentiary shall at all times retain control and supervision over said convicts in the same manner and to the same extent as if they were upon the State farms or in the penitentiary walls.

SEC. 17. Be it further enacted, etc., That in order to provide a fund for the carrying out of the provisions of this act, in the location, construction, or maintenance of any of the highways of this State, all surplus revenues received by the oyster commission of Louisiana and the board of commissioners for the protection of birds, game, and fish, or their successors in office, and all the proceeds of any special annual State tax that may be levied or collected for the purpose of constructing and maintaining the public roads and highways throughout the State, and the proceeds of any license tax on all vehicles kept for use that may be imposed by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, and all revenues or moneys which may be received under dedication herein shall constitute a State highway fund and shall be paid into the State treasury and there held as a State highway fund for the exclusive use and purposes of this act; and the treasurer is authorized to disburse same upon the warrant of the State highway engineer, approved by the president of the State board of engineers, for all expenditures authorized by this act.

Any portion of said State highway fund not expended at the expiration of any fiscal year shall remain in said fund and be available for expenditure during the succeeding fiscal year.

SEC. 18. Be it further enacted, etc., That the term "State highway" so used in this act shall be construed to include all highways constructed under the provisions of this act, and all such highways heretofore constructed to which the aid of the State has been extended.

SEC. 19. Be it further enacted, etc., That nothing in this act shall be construed so as to allow the highway commission created under this act to expend any funds of the State in the building or improvement of streets in incorporated cities or towns except in such cases where the streets connect two public roads constructed or improved under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 20. Be it further enacted, etc., That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Speaker of the House of Representatives.
P. M. LAMBREMONT,
Lieutenant Governor and President of the Senate.

Approved, June 29, 1910.

Governor of the State of Louisiana.

A true copy.

JOHN T. MICHEL, Secretary of State.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, this committee is to be congratulated upon its splendid work. The future alone can tell how much the country will owe us for the good work we have set in motion in this bill. If future Congresses will go forward with this important undertaking in keeping with its noble purpose, generations yet unborn will praise our names. This is not a perfect bill. It does not provide all that many of us would like to see it provide. It is a long step in the right direction and is the beginning of a policy that many of us have for years hoped and worked for.

FAVORED IT FOR YEARS.

For several years many of us have advocated national aid to road building and road maintenance. This bill starts the movement to that end.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM.

The platform adopted at Baltimore in 1912 pledges our party to the principle embodied in this bill. No room for doubt, uncertainty, or hesitation is left by the clause making the pledge, which is as follows:

We favor national aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads.

It is the plain duty of our party, now in control, to give the country legislation in keeping with this promise, and by so doing a wonderful impetus will be given to the movement for better roads. It will be a great forward step taken in the amelioration and improvement of rural conditions.

RURAL ROUTES.

As this bill is worked out on the basis of population and miles of rural and star mail routes in each State, it will no doubt be of interest to call attention to the fact that there are 42,961 rural routes in the United States with a combined length of 1,042,477 miles; there are 12,257 star routes with a combined length of 156,457 miles; making a total length of both the star and rural routes 1,198,934 miles. In Georgia we have 1,677 rural routes with a combined length of 39,896 miles, and 150 star routes with a combined length of 1,461 miles. If the two are totaled, we have in star and rural routes a length of 41,357 miles in our State. The amount Georgia would get through this bill for its roads would be $771,250.

The bill under consideration does not go as far as the bill which I introduced on this subject. My bill was somewhat similar to this one. The committee has reported this bill. I hope to see it speedily enacted into law. What we want are results.

GOOD ROADS A VITAL QUESTION.

One of the most vital questions which confronts the American people to-day is that of improving their public highways. This problem has been left by the National Government to be solved by the several States and their local political subdivisions in such manner as they may best be able. While this is a great burden for the States and smaller subdivisions to bear, and while the interstate nature of many of these public roads and of present-day traffic would seem to impose a part, at least, of this burden upon the National Government, yet these States and smaller subdivisions are assuming this burden in a manner becoming a great people, and great strides are being made in the direction of its solution. Evidence of this is afforded by the progress actually attained. The first authentic road census in this country was taken by the Office of Public Roads of the United States Department of Agriculture in the year 1904. This census disclosed the fact that we had a road mileage aggregating about 2,150,000, of which about 153,000 miles were improved. Our annual expenditure for road purposes that year amounted to about $80,000,000. In 1909 a second census was taken. This second census showed that during the five-year period the mileage of improved roads had increased to about 190,000, or nearly 25 per cent. The expenditures for that year were not obtained, but according to figures recently compiled in the Office of Public Roads the road expenditures for 1912 approximated the enormous sum of $163,000,000.

From these facts it is evident that the States and their minor subdivisions are putting forth a supreme effort to improve their highway conditions. It is apparent that they recognize the importance of this improvement and regard it of such pressing need that they are willing to spend their money and their energy in its accomplishment. This spirit of progressiveness should be commended. Not only should it be commended, but it should be rewarded by the National Government joining hands with the States and, through a spirit of wholesome cooperation, aiding and assisting them in furthering the development of a better system of highways throughout this entire country, as this bill proposes to do.

A PROGRESSIVE MOVEMENT.

Nearly every progressive undertaking looking to the advancement of our civilization is receiving some measure of aid or encouragement from our National Government. Laws have been enacted for the purpose of stimulating efforts in literature, the useful arts, and inventions by a system of liberal copyrights, trade-marks, and patents. Annual contribution is made to the education of the youth of every State in the Union. Large amounts have been expended for the improvement of our waterways. Lighthouses and danger signals are maintained along all navigable waters to safeguard their commerce. Donations of public lands, aggregating 197,000,000 acres, have been made for the purpose of promoting railroad development throughout the country, and at present the Interstate Commerce Commission is maintained to prevent the railroads from charging excessive rates for transportation. The United States Department of Agriculture, with its corps of well-trained scientists, is engaged in trying to teach the farmers of the country to adopt better methods of farming so as to increase their annual production, which has already reached the $9,000,000,000 mark. But with all this, as broad as may seem the activities of our National Government and as liberal as may be its appropriations, it has not until now joined hands with the people in aid of the improvement of our highways, which are so vital to the welfare of our entire population, and particularly our rural population.

CITIES AND FARMS.

Consider for a moment the relative importance as great national economic factors of our farms and cities. Has it ever occurred to you that the American farm is the greatest known wealth producer and that our cities are almost equally famous as wealth consumers? Such is nevertheless the case. Primarily every city resident may be said to produce nothing. He is merely engaged in the consumption, distribution, or manipulation of that which is produced elsewhere, chiefly on the farm. On the other hand, every inhabitant of the farm may be said to be a producer, large or small, the value of their combined annual production exceeding the sum of $9,000,000,000.

Not only this, but a large per cent of the aggregate wealth of the United States is represented by farm property. Our total wealth at present is placed at about $130,000,000,000. Of this more than $40,000,000,000, or about one-third, consists of farm property. The yearly return on this investment in farm property is represented by our nine billions of annual farm production, which is about 22.5 per cent on the money invested. There is scarcely another class of property in existence which yields such satisfactory returns or plays so important a part in our commercial and industrial development. This readily appears from the fact that in 1910 our exports of farm products, exclusive of forest products, amounted to $871,158,425, or 50.9 per cent of all domestic exports, while our imports of farm products amounted to $687,509,115, or only 44.2 per cent of the total imports, leaving in our favor a balance of $183,649,310.

ROADS AND COMMERCE.

But this vast wealth of farm products must be hauled over our public roads before reaching the other channels of trade and commerce. It must be transported on the highways an average distance of about 9.4 miles before being served up as food for our city population, or to provide raw material for running our manufactories or to swell the volume of our foreign commerce. It would seem, therefore, a duty of the National Government to help improve the highways over which these products must be hauled and thus facilitate their reaching the markets for further distribution. Exceeding care is taken and vast sums of money expended by the Federal Government to improve the channels of transportation through which they must pass after being removed from the farms. To promote this purpose donations of public lands aggregating 197,000,000 acres were made to the railroads, and the mammoth project of all ages is now being prosecuted in Panama where approximately $500,000,000 is being expended in constructing the Panama Canal to afford a shorter route between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and to facilitate the commerce of the world generally.

Our people are progressive. They want to see our country in the fore front. They want all done that will advance the interest of our country and our people. However, if there are other projects of similar merit or equally essential to our public welfare they should receive equally as favorable consideration at the hands of the Government. An instance decidedly in point is the improvement of our public roads. It seems inconsistent on the part of our Government for it to expend such vast sums in order to facilitate the handling of our commerce and then not to take an equal interest in the improvement of the highways over which more than 50 per cent of the products which enter into this commerce must first pass. The originator and producer of this vast volume of commerce deserves some measure of consideration.

Another fact worthy of note in this connection is that the Government has expended nearly a quarter billion in the erection of public buildings in the towns and cities throughout the United States for the convenience of our city population. This was a large expenditure, yet its benefits only reach the approximate 47 per cent of our population living in the cities. Is it any more a duty of the Government to erect buildings in the cities to accommodate their population and add to their architectural beauty than it is to help build roads over which our farmers may haul their produce with ease and profit, and thus enable them to improve their farms and build more comfortable and attractive homes? It has been well said, "Tear down every edifice in our cities and labor will rebuild them, but abandon our farms and highways and our cities will disappear forever.

NO NEW MOVEMENT.

The necessity for this line of work was early recognized by the passage in 1806 of an act of Congress providing an appropriation for the construction of a great national highway from Cumberland, Md., westward. Appropriations of this character continued for a number of years, finally ceasing after reaching a total of $14,000,000. At the time these appropriations were made they represented a larger proportion of the then total wealth of the United States than would similar appropriations to-day aggregating $613,000,000, which is the total cost of the great French system of highways. The census of 1850, 12 years after the last appropriation for the old Cumberland road, placed the total wealth of the United States at $7,135,780,228, which is less than the present annual value of our farm products. It would seem, therefore, if such appropriations could be made at a time when the national exchequer was at such a low ebb, with the same principle and even greater reasons therefor now existing, that our National Government should no longer delay extending substantial aid to the cause of better roads.

ROADS NOW BEING BUILT.

Not only does it seem that these appropriations might be made, but they have been made within recent years. Not, however, for expenditure within our own territory, nor for the benefit of our citizenship, but to build roads in foreign territory. Since the War with Spain there has been expended from our National Treasury for road building in Alaska $1,925,000; in Porto Rico, $2,000,000; and in the Philippine Islands, $3,000,000; making a total of $6,925,000 thus appropriated for building roads outside of the continental United States.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF QUESTION.

Many protest against the constitutionality of national aid. Even among some Members of Congress a pronounced doubt seems to exist as to the constitutional authority for making such appropriations of public funds. But does it seem any more appropriate or a more rigid adherence to the letter and spirit of the Constitution for our Government to make such appropriations for the benefit of an alien population than for its own citizens? There is a very wise old saying that "Charity should begin at home," and it seems eminently applicable in this connection.

The Constitution is an instrument which we all revere. It has proven an anchor of safety in many a crisis, and if our ship of state shall always be steered in obedience to its mandates, our Republic will endure unto the end of time. We would not have a single clause or principle of that great instrument perverted, even if the doors of the Treasury would thereby be opened for the much-needed improvement of our highways. It is believed, however, that ample authority exists for Federal aid without the slightest warping of the Constitution. Paragraphs 1, 3 and 7, respectively, of section 8, article 1, provide as follows:

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States. * * * To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes. * * * To establish post offices and post roads.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Either of the foregoing paragraphs is sufficiently broad to afford Congress ample authority to make appropriations for highway purposes. The "general-welfare" clause in paragraph No. 1 has often been invoked as authority for various kinds of internal improvements. But the question may be asked, What constitutes an internal improvement? Well, in answer, it may be defined as an undertaking promotive of the public welfare, but of such magnitude as to defy individual effort.

The power of Congress to make appropriations for this class of improvements received considerable attention at the hands of Congress at an early date. In a speech in the United States Senate in 1830 Daniel Webster referred to this power of the Government in part as follows:

> Under this view of things, I thought it necessary to settle, at least for myself, some definite notions with respect to the powers of the Government in regard to internal affairs, and I arrived at the conclusion that the Government had power to accomplish sundry objects or aid in their accomplishment.

In an able speech in Congress in 1817, on the power of Congress to apply public money to internal improvements, John C. Calhoun spoke in part as follows:

> It is mainly urged that Congress can only apply the public money in execution of the enumerated powers. I am no advocate of refined arguments on the Constitution. The instrument was not intended as a thesis for the logician to exercise his ingenuity on. It ought to be construed with plain, good sense; and what can be more express than the Constitution on this very point? The first power delegated to Congress is comprised in these words: "To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." First, the power is given to lay taxes; next, the objects are enumerated to which the money accruing from the exercise of this power may be applied—to pay the debts, provide for the common defense, and promote the general welfare; and, last, the rule for laying the taxes is prescribed—that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform. If the framers had intended to limit the use of the money to the powers afterwards enumerated and defined, nothing could be more easy than to have expressed it plainly. I know it is the opinion of some that the words "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare," which I have just cited, were not intended to be referred to the power of laying taxes, contained in the first part of the section, but that they are to be understood as distinct and independent powers granted in general terms, and are gratified by a more detailed enumeration of powers in the subsequent part of the Constitution. If such were in fact the meaning, surely nothing can be conceived more bungling and awkward than the manner in which the framers have communicated their intention. If it were their intention to make a summary of the powers of Congress in general terms, which were afterwards to be particularly defined and enumerated, they should have told us so plainly and distinctly; and if the words "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare" were intended for this summary they should have headed the list of our powers, and it should have been stated that to effect these general objects the following specific powers were granted.

IMPROVE ROADWAYS AND WATERWAYS.

The improvement of our waterways is an internal improvement on which the Government is now making expenditures. In the early history of our country appropriations for roads and rivers and harbors were classed together. The veto messages of Presidents Madison, Monroe, Jackson, and Pierce urged the same constitutional objections against appropriations for rivers and harbors as for highways. The principle involved in these two lines of work has not changed nor have the clauses of the Constitution which authorize them been amended.

It may be claimed that waterway improvements, in addition to the "general welfare" clause, find authority under the clause of the Constitution conferring upon Congress the power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States * * *." Assuming that the authority is derived from this clause, is it not also applicable to roads? In the first place, what is commerce? Webster's Dictionary defines it as "the exchange or buying and selling of commodities." If, therefore, I live on a farm 10 miles from the market, railroad station, or wharf and have $1,000 worth of produce which I wish to dispose of, at what time does that produce enter the realm of commerce? Is it when I load my wagon and drive away from the farm with it or is it not until I shall have delivered it at the market, railroad station, or wharf? Logically my produce would be just as much articles of commerce while in transit from my farm to the point of delivery as after reaching there, and the public highway over which I might perform the haul would be just as much a route of commercial transportation as the railroads or waterways which might handle it afterwards.

IMMENSE COMMERCE.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, there originated along the lines of our railroads 968,464,000 tons of freight. Did the constituent commodities which entered into this freight not become articles of commerce before delivery at the railroad station? During 1910 our exports exceeded $1,700,000,000, of which 50.9 per cent was farm products, exclusive of forest products. Did the commodities represented by this vast sum not become articles of commerce until they reached the wharf for foreign shipment? Manifestly such is not the case. A commodity produced for commercial purposes becomes an article of commerce at the place of production, and it enters the channels of commerce the moment it is sold or exchanged or started in transit for sale or exchange. The vast tonnage of our railroads and water transportation routes consists largely of farm and other products originating away from the station or wharf, the initial haul being over our public roads. Therefore our public roads have as strong a claim on the Government under the commerce clause of the Constitution as do our waterways.

ANOTHER CONSTITUTIONAL CLAUSE.

However, there is yet another clause of the Constitution which affords Congress this power more clearly than either of the foregoing. This is the clause conferring the power "to establish post offices and post roads." The authority granted by this clause is specific, and inasmuch as the Government uses the public roads every day in the transportation of the mails it would seem proper and timely for the exercise of this power. The rural delivery of mails is made each day over the public highways, the average number of miles traveled daily by rural carriers exceeding 1,000,000, or nearly one-half of all roads in the United States. Being a daily user of almost one-half of all our public roads, and the condition of these roads being so vital to efficiency and economy in the administration of the Rural Delivery Service, it would seem that the Government should take a hand in the improvement of these roads.

GOVERNMENT SHOULD HELP.

No country has good roads except where the general government has shared the responsibility of building and maintaining them. All of the European countries which have improved roads have acquired them under a system whereby their national governments have borne a part of the cost and assisted in the supervision of their construction and maintenance. France is recognized as having the finest roads of any country in the world, but in the building of these roads the national Government of France contributed over $600,000,000, and supervises their maintenance to-day. Road conditions in some of the more progressive European countries are worthy of mention.

FRANCE.

France has an area of 207,054 square miles, a population (1901) of 38,962,000, and the total mileage of all public roads is 516,000 miles. This gives practically 2½ miles of road for every square mile of area and 75 people per mile of road. As compared with the United States, we have 2,200,000 miles of road, which gives an average of 0.74 mile of road per square mile of area and a population of 41 per mile of road. On the other hand, Massachusetts has 2.15 miles of road per square mile of area and a population of 195 per mile, while Ohio has 2.18 miles of road per square mile of area and a population of 54 per mile of road.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The movement in England since 1878 has been toward the consolidation and enlargement of highway districts and the power of the supervising officials. The first step in this movement really began in 1835, through an act of Parliament which gathered all existing statutes into one law and added certain clauses, among which was a permissive clause whereby several parishes could join together for road administration purposes. In 1862 the highway-district act was passed, which provided for the formation of highway districts consisting of several parishes and controlled by a highway board. The act was amended in minor detail in 1864.

The next act was the highway and locomotive (amendment) act of 1878. This provided for a more workable district and central authority and provided for taking over the disturnpiked roads. One-half of the cost of main-road maintenance was borne by the county and one-half by the districts and parishes. Ten years later (1888) the local-government act threw the care of all main roads on the county councils and abolished the old highway boards.

The last act of epoch-making importance is the development and road improvement funds act, 1909, which provides for a road board, the members to be appointed by the treasury. The board has power, with approval of the treasury, to make advances to the county councils and other highway authorities in respect to construction of new roads and the improvement of old ones. The advances may be either in form of grant or loan. The revenues are to be raised from licenses on motor vehicles and certain licenses and excises on the sale, manufacture, and import of petrol (gasoline).

SWITZERLAND.

In general the public roads in Switzerland are divided into two main classes—cantonal roads, sometimes called State roads, and local or communal roads. With the exception of a few intermountain and other roads of national importance over which the National Government exercises supervision, the cantonal roads are controlled entirely by the Cantons. The Federal supervision of these roads of national importance is largely limited to the voting of annual indemnities to the four Cantons of Grisson, Tessin, Uri, and Valais, which total about $103,000. If the special roads are not maintained in proper condition, the Federal funds are withheld. The cantonal roads are generally placed under the direct charge of a highway department. Construction and maintenance are entirely supervised by this authority, while the funds are voted by cantonal government, usually under the budget system. In the new construction it is very customary for the Canton to pay a portion of the cost, while the remainder is assessed on the commune or parish. In the Canton of Vaud the proportion is 70 per cent by the State and 30 per cent by the commune. The Canton of Berne pays from 25 to 70 per cent, according to the financial condition of the commune, while the Canton of Tessin requires all new construction to be paid in full by the communes traversed. The maintenance of the cantonal roads, on the other hand, is in general all borne by the Canton. A few Cantons require the respective communes to transport the necessary road materials from the pits or quarries to the road.

The maintenance of the cantonal or State roads is by roadmen employed throughout the year, as in France and Germany. The average length of section assigned to each man is about 3 miles. The annual salary of the cantonniers, or roadmen, varies from $150 to $200. In some Cantons the roadmen are also allowed the hay and pasturage along the roadside. Trees are only occasionally planted along the roadsides.

SWEDEN.

In Sweden every county is a separate community with regard to the construction and maintenance of public roads, bridges, and ferries. The county government board, appointed by the Crown, superintends the proper maintenance of the roads and bridges within the county. The orders of this board are executed by the superior sheriff (kronofogde), deputy sheriffs (landsman), and assistant sheriffs (fjerdingsman).

The roads of the county are inspected once a year by a board consisting of the deputy sheriff and two jurors. A schedule for the inspection tour is published in advance and full records are kept of the inspection. A full report is made to the road board, and such road maintainers or road managers as are found to have defective road sections are notified with detailed instructions of the necessary repairs. If these are not made within a specified time, fines are imposed, and the deputy sheriff may also have the work done and charge the expense to the road managers.

Until 1891 road maintenance was almost entirely "in natura," i. e., by the owners or tillers of the soil. Now, an additional revenue is raised from other taxable property than land, which constitutes a so-called "road fund."

The roads are divided into road districts, which are in turn divided into allotments to be maintained "in natura." These allotments are changed from time to time by the county government, but only on substantial evidence showing the need of such change. The road fund is distributed to the various allotments, and for the district in general in a somewhat complicated manner by a board or committee, in which both the county and district have a voice.

The Royal Board of Road Building and Water Works (Kongl. Vag-Och Vattenbygnadstyrelsen) has supervisory and advisory powers in matters concerning road construction, railroads, harbors, etc. This board is composed of officers who, besides being graduated in the departments at the technical high school, have also passed a military course in the fortification corps in the army.

In maintenance the Federal Government contributes to the road fund a sum equal to 15 per cent of the total cost, while in new construction the Government pays two-thirds and the road district one-third. The method of handling the funds and carrying out the work of construction is very similar to that already described for maintenance.

Great progress is being made in this country in the work of road improvement through the efforts of the States and local governmental units, but the progress being attained is not as great as the importance of this question should justify. In order to accelerate this progress, our National Government, following the example set by the National Governments of the progressive European countries, should lend its aid. Agitation looking to this end has been going on for a number of years, and a strong sentiment exists throughout the country in favor of such action. Not only this, but the number of bills which have been introduced in both Houses of Congress providing for some system of national aid indicates that a strong sentiment exists in Congress for participation in this work. Therefore it behooves this Congress to take action looking to this end, such as this bill proposes.

HAND IN HAND.

The improvement of the roadways and the waterways, as well as all other internal improvements, which are of so much interest and benefit to the people, should go hand in hand. We do not have to cut one wire of progress that another might be strung. We do not have to deny the people and the country one benefit in order to give them another. This country is big enough and strong enough to build her roadways, improve her waterways, and make such other internal improvements as are for the general good of our people.

THOMAS JEFFERSON FAVORED IT.

I wish to quote the language of Thomas Jefferson in favor of improving our waterways and roadways, which is as follows:

Shall it lie unproductive in the public vaults? Shall the revenue be reduced? Or shall it not, rather, be appropriated to the improvement of roads, canals, rivers, education, and other great foundations of prosperity and union under the powers which Congress may already possess or such amendment of the Constitution as may be approved by the States?

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM FAVORS IT.

As stated in the outset, the Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore in 1912 declared in favor of roadway improvement. It also declared, as previous platforms had done, in favor of waterway improvements. Every Democrat is committed to both policies.

BETTER PRICES.

The improvement of our harbors means the bringing of the markets of the world to our door. More markets mean more competition for our products. Competition means better prices. Improved waterways mean cheaper and easier freights to our people. Couple with this improved roadways, which is another benefit the people should have, and it reduces the cost of putting our products to the railroads and the ports, which, of course, is another immense saving to the producer.

THIS CONGRESS SHOULD ACT.

The people want this legislation. They want this aid that will mean so much to the rapid development of our country. Many of us have worked hard and long for it. I hope this Congress will enact it into law during this session.

STATE CONTROL.

The committee report filed with this bill states that if this bill becomes a law the roadways of the country will still be left under State control, which meets the views of many of us in this regard. The States should retain control of their highways.

COMMUNITY ROADS.

We have for years had considerable aid through the Office of Public Roads in the Agricultural Department. That office has rendered much and valuable aid in stimulating road work throughout the country, and if this bill becomes a law the usefulness of that office will materially increase and will be able to give the people of the country what they have been waiting and hoping for, and that is a system of good roads in this country in a few years that will be a monument to those who have brought it about and a blessing to the American people. It will give them a system of good roads for practical purposes and uses. It does not contemplate any great highway, but a system of community highways that will result in inestimable value to the great masses and producing element of our citizenship. This bill carries $25,000,000 as an aid to road building and road maintenance in the United States. This is a considerable sum, but it goes to the direct benefit of all the people and puts the burden upon the shoulders of the people living in the great cities, as well as the people in the country, to help build and maintain our highways. The money could not be put to a better purpose. It could not be spent for a purpose that would result in greater benefit to our whole country. It is a movement that deserves and should have the unqualified support of progressive and patriotic citizens in every part of this great country of ours. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be some misapprehension as to this bill on the part of the gentlemen who have undertaken to criticize it. It is not the purpose of this bill to donate public money to be wasted on roads. On the contrary it is intended that the money afforded for this form of domestic improvement shall be expended in such a way as to convert bad roads into good roads, or to maintain good roads in a condition of permanent excellence. It is a further purpose of this bill to stimulate good road making, and in addition to aid those roads, which the communities have brought up to such a standard of excellence that they may be regarded as thoroughly efficient highways.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] seemed to think that under the operation of this bill, Missouri would not receive, as compared, for instance, with Indiana, an adequate proportion of the road appropriation. I simply wish to call his attention to the fact that the failure of one State to qualify itself to secure its full quota of the general fund, will not enable another State to secure any sum, or amount, in excess of its ascertained quota, or proportion. For instance, if Indiana by reason of the fact that it has brought its dirt or other roads up to the standard provided in this bill is in a situation to receive every dollar of the quota ascertained for that State, such a situation will not affect the amount that would go to the State of Missouri, the State of Virginia, or to any other State in the Union, provided they conform themselves to the requirements of this measure. The purpose of this bill, as I have stated, is to bring about a universal improvement in the roads of the country. It is not a scheme of wasteful expenditure of money. On the contrary every safeguard against waste and extravagance has been provided. Any State desiring to avail itself of the benefits of this measure must meet the rigid requirements imposed. Under one section the State must maintain roads of a high standard of excellence, before it is entitled to receive any allowance. A State operating under the other section must afford an amount at least equal to the amount appropriated to be expended in that State by the Federal Government. My own State will operate under the section already cited, for the reason that our experience with the cooperative principle is altogether favorable.

It is not in contemplation or expectation that the dirt roads of any State, are in such a present condition or may be immediately put in such a condition, that they will be able to secure at the end of the present fiscal year the entire proportion of the quota allotted to that State.

This fact is not to the prejudice of any State. Each State must qualify itself by its own efforts to secure the amount to which it is entitled. Take the State of Virginia, for instance. If we are not willing by our domestic contributions to qualify ourselves to receive Federal aid, then to that extent Virginia will not enjoy the benefits of the bill. But to the extent that we qualify ourselves by our own exertions, we will be in a position to draw on the quota allotted to our State under the general scheme of distribution.

Taking the States of Missouri and Indiana, for the purpose of comparison, I notice that the proportion of mileage of post roads in Missouri, as compared with the proportion of post roads in Indiana is practically the same. This being so, the proportion, or quota that would be assigned to Missouri, on account of post-road mileage would be as great as that assigned to Indiana. But if Missouri does not undertake to improve her roads, or to meet the requirements of the bill, she will not be in a position to secure any proportion of her quota. Is that unreasonable?

We have not worked out a scheme to waste the public money. We repel any intimation that we have formulated a "pork barrel." On the contrary we have worked out a systematic, well-constructed plan, under which, not only will the present roads of the country be improved, but a stimulus is afforded for the construction of the most approved types of highways.

Some comment has been made on the fact that different amounts are provided for the maintenance of different types of roads. Such a distinction is inevitable, and is fair. It is less expensive to maintain a dirt road, than a costly concrete, or macadam road. Another thing we had in mind was, that the ideal to which we are working is a universal system of highways in the United States, one that will conform to the highest standard of improved roads. We know that the realization of this ideal is a long way ahead. We have no illusions about the matter. And while we are working to this end, we know that for the time being, and for many years to come the ordinary roads must be used, but, we hope, in an improved condition. In course of time, and with the influences now at work, supplemented as they will be by Federal appropriation we confidently expect that the United States will be supplied with a system of roads that will compare with the highest type of highways in use in the most advanced countries of Europe.

It is the purpose of this bill to stimulate the localities, the States, and the subdivisions of those States, to raise everywhere the standard of road construction. For this reason we have provided a greater allowance for an improved type of road, than for the ordinary dirt road. The tendency in all the States is toward improved roads, and the distinction made by the bill, will encourage this tendency.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will.

Mr. PLATT. Have not the postal authorities got it in their power now to require any kind of road they want before they establish a rural-delivery route?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Suppose they have; what of it?

Mr. PLATT. They can do it without spending any of the Government's money, then.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Is it the gentleman's idea that the Federal Government shall not aid in this good work? If so, I do not agree with the gentleman. We could easily compel the States to do a great deal of work that is now being done by the Federal Government, by the simple process of declining to make appropriations for such improvements. The States would then be compelled to make these improvements, or do without them. It would be a sort of root hog, or die, proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] has expired.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield further to the gentleman.

Mr. SAUNDERS. We are not compelled to appropriate a dollar to dredge out the harbor of New York, or to dig the Ambrose Channel for the benefit of that city. We need not appropriate a dollar for levees in the Mississippi Valley. We need not appropriate a dollar for reclamation purposes. The United States could sit back, as it were, and say to the respective localities, "Go ahead and make your own improvements." The Federal Government has jurisdiction to do these things, but it is not compelled to do them. Would the gentleman be willing to see the Federal Government withdraw from all work of this character, and leave it to be done by the localities most intimately and directly affected?

Now, I maintain that with reference to the greatest good to the greatest number, there is no form of Federal appropriation that will secure a greater measure of betterment of social and economic conditions, than an appropriation for an improved system of highways in the United States. [Applause.] If that be true, then it affords an ample justification for Federal appropriations in aid of post roads. Moreover the Democratic Party in the terms of its latest platform, is committed to this principle.

We have provided for no extravagant appropriation in this bill. Under the present system the entire cost of dredging a river, or a harbor is borne by the Federal Government.

But with reference to this much greater work, namely the work of improving the public roads, the Government says in substance to the localities to be affected: "I will not afford a dollar until, as a result of your own activities, you provide a corresponding dollar. In other words this is a half-and-half plan."

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. PARKER. I want to ask the gentleman this question: Is it not true that the United States Government has the entire control, for instance, of the harbor of New York, and that it is impossible for the State of New York to do it at its own expense?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; that is true. The Federal Government in the exercise of a Federal function dredges rivers and harbors, but it derives no benefit from the retention of jurisdiction over the completed work. The qualification of the improvement is the benefit to the entire country. There is ample authority for the appropriations contemplated by this bill, and the resulting benefits to the country at large will be far greater than any benefits that follow from any form of river, or harbor improvements. In this instance there is no occasion, or necessity to retain jurisdiction.

Mr. PARKER. But the gentleman, in answer to the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT], brought that up as an illustration.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; I called the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that the Government has expended vast sums in the neighborhood of the city of New York, although the rest of the country had a very remote interest in those expenditures.

Mr. PARKER. That is true; but in your roads proposition the State itself has the control of the roads.

Mr. SAUNDERS. But if the benefit inures to the general public, the Government secures its return from that fact. There is no occasion for the Government to insist upon control of the roads, in return for the aid which it affords.

Mr. PARKER. That is true; but I was asking the gentleman why he used that illustration or that parallel.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I used that illustration for the purpose of showing that in the past the Federal Government has appropriated vast sums upon improvements of great interest to particular communities, but of remote concern to the general public. Of course as citizens of a common country, we are in a sense benefited by every form of public improvement. Under the scheme of Federal aid to roads proposed by this bill, the benefits of this appropriation will reach into, and affect the remotest localities in the United States.

Mr. PARKER. That is true.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have ventured therefore to make a comparison between the benefits from river and harbor improvements, and the universal benefit that will ensue under this bill. I admit that in the one instance we retain jurisdiction, and in the other we do not. But what of it? How does the fact that the Federal Government refrains from claiming jurisdiction, in return for its aid, affect the propriety of making an appropriation that will confer such universal benefit?

Mr. PARKER. That is true; but does not that make the comparison illogical?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Not at all. Would my friend be willing to vote for this bill if we agree to demand Federal control?

Mr. PARKER. Over what?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Over the roads.

Mr. PARKER. Over the roads to be aided?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes. Would you be willing to vote for this bill, if the Government is given jurisdiction of all the roads that will be aided by the appropriation proposed?

Mr. PARKER. No.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Then the question of jurisdiction is not the stumblingblock with the gentleman.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. LLOYD. I think the gentleman from Virginia did not understand me, or I did not go far enough in my explanation to make it clear to him. The gentleman knows my time was very much limited.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. I am fully in sympathy with the gentleman's view of it and in sympathy with the purpose of this bill, and I believe that the money should go to the benefit of the man who builds the roads and not to the benefit of the other man.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes. If any gentleman thinks that this bill provides that any road, without regard to its condition, will receive aid from the Federal Government, then in the result that gentleman will be very much disappointed.

Mr. LLOYD. That is what I wanted to bring out.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Referring to the inquiry propounded by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT], is it not true that in the years preceding 1826 the Erie Canal was built largely by the General Government?

Mr. PLATT. No. It was built by the State of New York.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is absolutely immaterial. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] admitted that he would not vote for this bill even if the Government was afforded authority over the roads.

Mr. PLATT. I think if the State of New York is given control of New York Harbor it will do all the dredging that is needed.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I would be perfectly willing to agree to that, if you would pay back all that the Government has expended about New York, and maintain your harbor and approaches on the same terms as they are now maintained by the Government. Does the gentleman think that New York would agree to that proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] is recognized.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, at the opening of the present Congress I had at my option either to remain a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, of which I had been a member in the Sixty-second Congress, or be placed on the newly constituted committee, that on Roads. Believing that I could render my district and State greater service as a member of the Roads Committee, and having spent my life as a farmer, living out in a rural section of the country, and knowing something by actual experience of the needs of that class of our people, I elected of my own accord to be placed on the Committee on Roads. I feel that by virtue of the fact that I have spent my entire life on a farm I am in a position to speak with some degree of knowledge as to the imperative need of better public highways.

In the consideration of this momentous subject there are three questions that present themselves to my mind. First, is there a need for the Federal Government to aid in the construction and improvement of public roads? Second, is it just and feasible for the Government to do so? Third, do the people desire this legislation?

As to the first proposition, the need of governmental aid, I shall discuss briefly the present condition of the roads of the country. There are, Mr. Chairman, about 2,300,000 miles of public roads in the United States. Of this amount only about 10 per cent, or 230,000 miles, are what may be termed improved roads. The other 90 per cent, or 2,070,000 miles, are still unimproved. Now, if it has required 140 years to get 10 per cent improved, will it not be too long to wait under the present system to get the other 90 per cent improved?

It is estimated by the Bureau of Good Roads of the Department of Agriculture that under present conditions it costs the farmers of the country $1,600,000,000 annually to haul their produce to the market, to say nothing of the cost to these same farmers of hauling those things they purchase from the towns back to their farms. Improved highways throughout the country would reduce this heavy, burdensome transportation tax at least one-half, or $800,000,000 per annum or $8 for each person in the United States. These figures almost stagger the imagination.

We hear much from our city brethren about the high cost of living, but if they had to exchange places with those of us who live in the country they would, I have no doubt, speedily change their minds on this subject. I sometimes wish, when I hear this wail about the high cost of living, that these people had to live on the farms for a brief time. If they had to go out and clear away the forests, dig up the stumps, fence and ditch the land, plow the fields, face the piercing cold, the scorching sun, the blinding snow, and the drenching rain, and also had to endure losses caused by droughts, floods, winds, and storms, and on top of that had to contend with blights, crop pests of many kinds; had to rise at 4 in the morning and go until 8 in the evening, in order to produce a crop, and then after the crop was produced had to haul it from 5 to 25 miles to market over a hilly, muddy, country road, they would, in my judgment, decide that the cost of production was even higher than the cost of living. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, taking into consideration the many disadvantages and hardships which the farmers have to contend against, they do not get enough for the products of their toil.

The only just way, in my humble opinion, to justly and fairly reduce the cost of living is to reduce the cost of production and the cost of transportation and distribution. With improved roads, transportation charges would be materially reduced, and thereby the cost of living somewhat lessened, or, what would be fairer, the just reward of the farmer would be increased. With better roads and our parcel-post system extended to all parts of the country, the speculator and the middle man can be, in a large measure, eliminated, thereby bringing the producer and consumer closer together to the mutual benefit and profit of both. The man who lives in the country and the man who lives in the city are interdependent upon each other—that is, mutually dependent one upon the other—and the prosperity and happiness of the one adds to the welfare and happiness of the other. While the farmer could live in a way without the city, the city can not endure at all without the country. It has been truly said that if you destroy the cities and leave the farms, the cities will soon be rebuilt; but that if you destroy the farms and leave the cities, grass will grow in their streets evermore. Therefore the dweller in the city should welcome this opportunity to aid his brother in the country. The city dweller should realize that not only must he get his food and the material from which his clothing is made from the country, but that he must also depend upon the country for a fresh supply of pure country manhood and womanhood to revitalize the constantly degenerating city population. City life tends toward decay, morally and physically, and if the strain of pure, vigorous country blood was cut off from the city, the leprosy of degeneration would within a few brief years bring the cities to a pitiable condition.

Better roads mean better farms, better dwellings, better schools, better churches, better society, more time for study and recreation, less for hardship and drudgery, and consequently more prosperity, sunshine, and happiness. By thus making country life more attractive a larger per cent of our strong, intelligent young men and women would be kept in the country instead of being lured to the cities by their attractions. By this means the country and city population would be nearer properly balanced, and neither would suffer from being overcrowded. So much, Mr. Chairman, for the first proposition; that is, the needs of and benefits to come from the better rural highways.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I crave the indulgence of the House for a few moments to speak of the justice and feasibility of the Federal Government aiding in the construction and improvement of the public highways of the country. Federal taxes are paid by all classes of our people, and simple justice demands that in the expenditure of the moneys thus collected equal consideration should be given to all classes of our citizens, both rural and urban.

The Federal Government aided in the construction of the trunk lines of railroad that opened up the great western section of our country to the amount of not less than 155,000,000 acres of valuable public lands. It appropriates $50,000,000 annually for river and harbor improvement. It has spent $400,000,000 at least in the last few years to build the Panama Canal. It expends annually $100,000,000 for the support and equipment of the Army and $150,000,000 for the Navy, making an annual appropriation of $250,000,000 for the military arm of our Government. Many millions are also appropriated annually for the public buildings in the towns and cities, while the country people have no roads to travel even to see these public buildings they have been taxed to help construct. Yet in spite of all this, some have been heard to protest against the small sum of $25,000,000 carried in this bill to help improve the rural highways of the country. Mr. Chairman, if I had my way, not another battleship would be built in this country until our post roads were all improved. Justice cries aloud for the speedy enactment of this measure. In fact, justice would say to expend many millions more, and thereby in a measure restore to our rural population at least a portion of that which they have been taxed for the exclusive benefit of those living in the towns and cities. I paraphrase the language of the Golden Rule, and say to you men who live in the cities, "As has been done to you, do ye even so unto us."

Now, Mr. Chairman, but a few words as to the last proposition—that is, the desire of the people for this legislation—and then I am done. Read, if you will, the platform of each of the three great national parties enunciated in 1912, and you will see that they all covenant with the people to enact this legislation if given the authority to do so. Does anyone doubt for a moment, if this question were submitted to a vote of the people of this country, what the verdict would be? No one can doubt it, and, my colleagues, if we fail to enact this legislation the people will rise up in their righteous wrath, as they should, and denominate us "unprofitable servants" and retire us to private life. Then our eyes will weep and our teeth will gnash, but it will be too late. I am glad, however, to see a Nation-wide patriotic spirit manifested in the discussion of this subject. Many Members of this House who represent city districts have risen to a high plane of statesmanship and declared for its passage. Mr. Chairman, there is no partisanship in this measure. The demand for it comes from the North and the South, the East and the West, and I predict that it will pass this House by practically unanimous vote. When that is done, and it receives the approval of the other branch of the Congress and is approved by our great President, it will mark the beginning of a new era in this country. Light and hope will spring up in the breast of every country child, and justice will be done, in a measure, to those to whom it has been denied so long.

Mr. Chairman, it is true that $25,000,000 will not go very far toward the improving of the highways of the country, but it will do to begin with. It will stimulate the States, counties, and local communities to greater endeavors. When this amount is supplemented by appropriations from all the States and subdivisions thereof, and when every man, woman, and child in the rural communities becomes an apostle of good roads, as they will, then will results be had that will benefit and bless the entire country and do us much honor. Then will that day arrive which the Hebrew prophet foresaw when he exclaimed, "And they shall build houses and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them. They shall not build and another inhabit; they shall not plant and another eat." [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I believe that the nearer the Federal Government gets to the people of the country in legislation the better will be the Government. I am heartily in favor of the Government helping in the building and upkeep of the roads of the country on the same principle that I favor and have so diligently worked to have the Federal Government rebuild and improve the levees of the Mississippi, so that it may be possible to reclaim the millions of acres of overflowed and swamp lands that are now in waste in the Mississippi Valley. Missouri alone has 2,500,000 acres of swamp and overflowed lands, useless and worthless to-day because the Government has not done its duty in protecting the levees and preventing these overflows and floods. If that land is reclaimed, as it can and will be if the Government gives the assistance it ought to give, it will mean many splendid and good farms all through the great Mississippi Valley. Not only will it restore to the people these 2,500,000 acres of land in Missouri, but some 77,000,000 acres in the entire Mississippi Valley. All of it can be reclaimed, with the necessary and proper attention by this Government.

I am also in favor of this proposed legislation for the dirt roads of the country, because it makes farm life happier. While my constituents, the people for whom I directly speak, do not specially need this legislation, since I represent a city district, yet I appreciate that the farmers of the country are entitled to the greatest consideration in this respect. The farmers need good roads for the purpose of getting to their towns and to their markets. They must have the ways and means of carrying their produce and products to the towns and to their shipping points in the interest of commerce. Good roads are as necessary to the farmer as good streets are necessary to the people who live in cities. The people of this country ought to be, and I believe are, in favor of assisting in good-road building such as this bill provides.

I am in favor of it again, because I know of its benefit to the city as well as because I know the necessity it is to the farmers. I am not in favor of it just because of the pleasure it may give to those who have automobiles and who want good roads built for that purpose, but for the farmers, in order that they may go to town in their wagons and in their buggies and get the use of these good roads. I know something of the conditions in the country. I was born on a farm in Missouri and lived upon it long enough to know that a bad road is a mighty tough proposition in many ways. Not alone on business, but socially as well. I am glad, therefore, as one Member of this House, to support the bill presented here by the Committee on Roads through its chairman, my distinguished colleague [Mr. SHACKLEFORD]. [Applause.]

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, under the leave granted me to extend my remarks I include the following article:

OPPORTUNITIES IN MISSOURI FOR AGRICULTURAL SETTLERS.

[By Prof. F. B. Mumford, dean State Agricultural College, Columbia, Mo.]

The highest priced agricultural land in America is located in the corn belt. The reason for this is that the area in which Indian corn may be grown successfully is limited. Not only in America, but the areas of land suitable for growing Indian corn in the world outside of the United States is very small. Sir John B. Lawes once said that Europe could never hope to compete with America in agriculture, because of the ease with which corn may be grown in this country.

Missouri lies in the center of the American corn belt; there are no corn lands superior to those found in Missouri. One man in Missouri grows more corn each year on his farm than is grown in the 9 States of Utah, Oregon, Washington, Arizona, Idaho, Montana, Rhode Island, Wyoming, and Nevada combined. Three counties in Missouri grow more corn than 19 other States, in which are included all of New England. These 3 counties grow more corn than is reported for the State of New York, or Maryland or West Virginia. Missouri grows three times as much corn as all of South America, three-fifths as much as all of Europe, and nearly one-half as much as is produced in the whole world outside of the United States.

The value of the corn crop in Missouri each year amounts to more than $100,000,000. Her wheat crop is valued at $30,000,000. Missouri is also one of the leading hay and forage States. In 1909 the hay crop alone for the State was valued at over $30,000,000. This does not include the vast areas of blue grass, clover, and timothy pastures which in point of extent and quality are not exceeded by any State in the Union.

The above facts are evidence of the abundant resources and high state of fertility of Missouri lands. In Missouri land is to-day cheaper, considering its intrinsic value, than in any of the corn-belt States. Good corn land, which has already become scarce and so much in demand that it sells in some localities at $250 per acre, is still to be had in Missouri for less than $100 an acre.

Of all the corn-belt States Missouri has more unoccupied land than any other. Twenty million acres are unimproved. Large areas of this land need only the intelligent skill of the husbandman to add millions of dollars to the total agricultural revenue of the State. Much of this land is peculiarly adapted to the production of high-class fruits. Larger areas can be made into productive and profitable pastures for cattle, sheep, and horses. Some of the land adapted for grazing purposes can be purchased at from $3 to $10 per acre.

Missouri has more apple trees than any other State in the Union. She has the largest orchard in the world. In good fruit years the total apple product of Missouri exceeds that of many of the great apple States.

In the production of live stock Missouri has always rivaled adjoining States, which are more generally given to grain farming. More than $1,000,000,000 is invested in farms, buildings, and equipment for carrying on the business of stock farming in this State. While Missouri is not generally regarded as a sheep-producing State, it is nevertheless true that she has more sheep than any adjoining State. The poultry product of Missouri is greater than that of any other American State.

Another reason for the remarkable productive power of Missouri crops and live stock is due to the favorable climate. Missouri is far enough north to escape the enervating heat of the South and far enough south to avoid the rigorous climate of the North. The Missouri farmer pastures his animals eight or nine months in the year and requires little expensive shelter for the mild winters. The rainfall is abundant and well distributed and hot winds are unknown.

The State of Missouri maintains for the aid of the prospective settler an agricultural experiment station, which is organized for the purpose of solving new agricultural problems and giving advice to all farmers in the State; outlying experiment fields in 20 localities are solving the local problems due to special soils or particular locations. The State of Missouri has, through the agricultural experiment station, demonstrated the efficacy of the serum treatment for hog cholera and is inoculating at the present time more than 10,000 hogs per month.

The Missouri State Board of Agriculture is organized to aid the farmers of the State by means of farmers' institutes, veterinary sanitation, thus safeguarding the health of Missouri live stock, and through its highway department to encourage the construction and maintenance of country roads. This excellent organization, appointed by the governor, has contributed largely to the development of the State.

The State board of horticulture likewise has accomplished through publications and public meetings great service to the horticultural interests of Missouri.

The State poultry board has contributed largely to the preeminent position of the State in aiding the poultry interests by publications, poultry shows, and, more recently, in the development of a poultry station.

The organized government of the State is through these various agencies protecting and aiding the agricultural citizens of the State. Probably no State in the United States has a more excellent series of State boards, appointed by the government primarily for the development of the agricultural, horticultural, and live-stock interests of the State.

[Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. OLDFIELD].

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I know of no legislation which is of more importance and of more benefit to the masses of the people than good-roads legislation, and I desire to state in the outset of my remarks that we, in passing this bill, are carrying out another platform pledge of our party. The Baltimore platform says:

We favor national aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads.

This bill carries an appropriation of $25,000,000 to aid the States in constructing and maintaining roads over which the mails are transported, and I want to ask why, if there is any reason, should we not aid the States in building roads for the people in furtherance of our program to improve the general conditions under which we live so far as legislation will accomplish that end? We have appropriated nearly $400,000,000 for the purpose of constructing the Panama Canal. Every year we have appropriated large sums to improve the rivers and harbors of the country. We have appropriated millions of dollars of the people's money for the purpose of constructing post-office buildings throughout the country; hence, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that too long already have been deferred appropriations for construction and maintenance of good roads, the benefits of which would be directly felt every day in the year by every citizen of the Republic. This bill provides for a cooperative plan by which the States and the local communities bear a proper proportion of the expense, and United States Government, through the Department of Agriculture, meets the obligation we owe the people in this great undertaking.

Mr. Chairman, the tax known as the "bad-roads tax" is the heaviest burden borne by the American people to-day, and Hon. Logan W. Page, Director of the Office of Public Roads and our greatest road expert, tells us that—

Not less than $250,000,000 is the tribute levied annually on the people of the United States by bad roads.

Mr. Chairman, this is an enormous economic waste, and we should relieve the people of our rural communities of this burden just as soon as possible. Lord Macaulay, in his History of England, says:

Of all inventions, the alphabet and the printing press alone excepted, those inventions which abridge distance have done most for the civilization of our species. Every improvement of the means of locomotion benefits mankind morally and intellectually as well as materially.

Statistics show that in States where there are good roads 85 per cent of the children of school age attend the public schools, while in States where the roads have not been improved only about 65 per cent of the children receive the benefit of the public schools. Statistics also show that a greater percentage of illiteracy obtains in localities where they have bad roads than in communities traversed by good roads. Therefore this legislation will promote the cause of education in our country. Yes, Mr. Chairman, the question of good roads is one of the greatest questions confronting our people. One of the first bills I introduced in Congress was a good-roads bill, and I might add that the bill before the House to-day is similar in many respects to the bill I introduced nearly five years ago. The farmers of the United States in 1913 produced crops valued at nearly $10,000,000,000, and in order to market this crop it was necessarily hauled over bad roads, and the Director of the United States Office of Public Roads tells us in his reports that because of these bad roads it cost the farmers, and, of course, the consumers ultimately, $250,000,000 more to market their crops than would have been the expense with good roads; hence, you see that this is a serious and important question. We ought to eliminate this waste and bring the producers and consumers of the country into closer and easier communication.

The question of good roads goes to the very root of the cause of the high cost of living in this country—build good roads for the farmers and the present annual waste of $250,000,000 will become an investment daily working a betterment of our economic conditions of life, and every fiber of our public structure will begin to strengthen and grow with new vigor from the hour Congress makes an appropriation giving our people Federal aid in the construction of their roads.

Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary that I should recall the many advantages to the people of this legislation, because they must be apparent to all. Now that we have the rural free-delivery system well established, with the rural telephones and the parcel-post system in operation, if we will but aid our people in building and maintaining good roads, we will make farm life in this country attractive and solve one of the greatest problems of our modern civilization. I hope this bill will become a law at any early date. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK].

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this bill, and thereby express my tribute to the Committee on Roads for the careful consideration it has given the subject, for the intelligence and extensive labors of its chairman and the author of this bill, Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I give this bill my support because I believe that the avenues through which the farm produce reaches the city consumer and by which our rural mail is transported to the farmer are of primary importance and properly the subject of Federal legislation and aid.

The appropriation of a maximum of $25,000,000 is sure to stimulate and encourage the building of good roads throughout the entire country. I desire, in reminding you that this sum of money is to be taken from the fund paid by the taxpayers into our Federal Treasury, to call your attention to my farm-credit bill, H. R. 11897, and its clause providing a road fund.

This bill, if it should become a law, will provide this $25,000,000 annually, and no tax or cost of any kind, to the extent even of one penny, will be charged against the people.

In my speech printed in the RECORD of September 11, 1913, I inserted, on page 5143, a table showing what the profit would be to the Government by lending money to the farmers upon only about one-half of the farm first mortgages now in force. This table reveals the rather startling fact that the annual profit on such loans would be more than $25,000,000. This profit would accrue to the Government if it should borrow money at 3 per cent and lend it in this way at 4½ per cent.

Some of my colleagues are inclined to turn this profit over to a few private money lenders in a bankers' farm-credit scheme rather than to give the profit in good roads to the farmers who pay it. They are for good roads, very properly, but they are willing to neglect an opportunity to save this $25,000,000 to the taxpayers of this country.

Some of these say that Government loans to farmers is class legislation, but are not against perpetrating the more drastic class legislation by exempting from all taxation a new class of banks in order that these bankers may make this profit of over $25,000,000 per year with which to buy automobiles to ride in over these roads that the people are taxed annually this large sum to construct and maintain.

They claim it is class legislation for the Government to make this profit of $25,000,000 per year in helping the farmers, but it is not class legislation for the Government to help the bankers make it by giving them exemption from all taxes.

Government loans are not new or novel. Every leading Government on earth lends money to farmers. We as a Government are now lending money to the Philippine farmers. We are doing for the brown men now, and have been doing it successfully for six years, what I would like to have this Government do for the white farmers of this country.

Mr. Chairman, there is no necessity of giving special privilege to a new money power in the way of exemption from taxation or in any other manner. The Government of the United States can constitutionally and should lend money on farm first mortgages. It should not be paternalistic to a few bankers who desire to lend money to farmers. It can without any possibility of loss and with a certainty of profit take care of this great national policy itself. It should not turn this great purpose of the perpetuation of our food supply over to the mercies of private profit.

Later on, Mr. Chairman, I will take up the subject of private-profit farm credit, conducted by money lenders and a special kind of banking institution, but at this juncture I wish to review in some detail what other countries are doing in the way of Government loans to farmers. However, before beginning this review I wish to state concisely the theory and purpose of my bill, H. R. 11897. This bill is predicated upon the theory that Government aid and self-help should go hand and hand. I do not believe that anything can be accomplished by proposing only self-help to the helpless.

On this theory I propose in the bill that the Government shall borrow money upon bonds based upon farm first mortgages and guaranteed by the Government, pay a rate of interest not in excess of 3½ per cent, and lend the money at a rate not in excess of 4½ per cent.

The bill provides that this can be done directly to the farmer, or to the farmer through farm-credit associations. The latter provision would be the most effective encouragement to farmers' farm-credit associations possible, and I believe they would spring up in every county and the long waiting for any other plan to become effective would be avoided.

Thus, by the provisions of the bill Government aid going hand in hand with self-help would work out as follows:

In my county there are about $800,000 of farm first mortgages upon farm homes. In this indirect lending on these mortgages the Government would provide that the farmers of this county should organize a farm-credit association with a capital of say $10,000. This association, conforming to certain rules and regulations, would act as the agent of the Government in appraising, inspecting, and perhaps making collections on these mortgages. The association would indorse the mortgage notes. For this service the Government would pay it annually not to exceed one-half of 1 per cent on the sum of the loans. This would assure the success of the local farm-credit association at once and would leave it to employ its own capital in making short-time loans. Restrictions and limitations could be imposed upon it without the delay of enacting and repealing antagonistic State laws, which could be enforced by the alternative of losing this Federal privilege.

The mortgages would become the property of the Government, and, with the bonds, would be exempt from taxation, without conflict with the States, and the profit would redound to the benefit of all the people instead of to a very few. The great work of securing better credit facilities for the farmers on both long-time and short-time loans would begin at once in an effective manner, without the delays which surely will follow any private profit-sharing banking scheme.

The bill is not complicated, and a further review of its provisions seems unnecessary.

I now take up the subject of Government loans in other countries. I have gleaned this information from various sources which I deem official and authentic. I have secured the facts from the yearbooks of Germany, New Zealand, Australia, and other countries; the reports of the English estates commission, reports of the ministers of finance, and the laws of countries referred to; reports of the treasurer of the Philippine Islands and of the Philippine Commission; report of our French ambassador; the writings and reports of the delegate of the United States to the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome; numerous congressional documents, including Senate Documents 17 and 214.

GOVERNMENT AID IN GERMANY.

There are 16 institutions in Germany whose liabilities in the shape of mortgages, debentures, or obligations to depositors are guaranteed by the State or Province. It is the regular business of these institutions to lend to individuals on mortgage security, and the profits derived from this business revert to the Government. These institutions are managed, owned, and controlled by the Government. To make this plain, I will say that if the State of Ohio were to open a bank, supply its capital from State funds, guarantee all its obligations, and appoint an official to manage it, Ohio would be doing about the same as is done by one of these Provinces of Germany.

These institutions have been established from as early as 1832 up to 1894, and the great importance of their assistance to agriculture can not be overestimated.

These 16 institutions up to the year 1909—a later report not being accessible—had loaned in round numbers $485,540,985.

In 1895 the Prussian State Central Cooperative Bank was established as a State-endowed institution. This bank lends money in large sums to cooperative credit societies. It is stated by the Prussian minister of finance that this was found necessary in order to "steady the interest rate." The State of Bavaria followed suit with a central loan bank, endowing it with a capital through the issue of its bonds, amounting to $1,000,000,000. In other words, this one State of Germany advanced for the aid of mortgage creditors its credit as a state a sum equal to about one-third of the farm-mortgage indebtedness of our 48 States.

The Prussian bank in the year 1907 loaned $165,000,000; in 1911, $187,361,883.

None of these institutions or banks are in the slightest sense conducted for private profit, are operated exclusively for the people, yet with a margin of profit on interest not much more than one-half of 1 per cent, in the year 1907 it paid upon its endowed capital of $18,750,000 a dividend of 1.49 per cent.

There are numerous provincial-aid banks in Germany to which the Prussian Government for their foundation capital has issued in the last 50 or 60 years the sum of approximately $1,700,000. The Prussian act of 1896 appropriated a sum approximating $1,250,000 for the building of granaries in order to remove the middleman's excessive profit on part of the food supply.

Baron von Hermen-Schorn, former agriculture expert of the Germany Embassy, says:

> The cooperative rural-credit systems in Germany were not carried on as effectively as they are now under Government assistance.

He also says that—

> A system started by bankers and run by bankers could in no sense be a cooperative system and probably would not help the interest of farmers for any length of time.

Speaking of the public savings banks and various Government-aid institutions of credit in Germany, he says:

> Private banks have been asked if they have ever felt any interference by the savings banks in their business, and they say they have not.

In this connection I wish to inform the committee that the commercial rate in Germany now is from 1½ to 2½ per cent higher than the land-mortgage interest rate. Also, that the bankers of New Zealand, who in 1896 opposed the lending of money to the farmers by the Government, stated afterwards that it did not injure their business but seemed to stimulate their business generally.

Mr. William C. Teichmann, United States consul at Mannheim, Germany, states that the increased facilities for securing loans has not resulted in the farmers going into debt to their disadvantage as "the farmer is careful and conservative."

During the 70 years that the Government Land Bank of Weisbaden has been in existence it has never lost a penny on land mortgages.

Of the section of country near Weisbaden, Mr. Reusch, councilor of Weisbaden, states that out of every thousand farmers 756 are without any debts.

The Land Bank of Weisbaden has 28 branches, and is a fair sample of Government aid in Germany. The Parliament, which meets every year, elects three members for life and three honorary members who manage the bank. The State guarantees the mortgages, guarantees the debentures, and guarantees every debt of this bank in Prussia. No official of the land can have an interest in the business of the bank. Each official has a salary and is prohibited from taking any part in the banking business. The profits go to the Government. If there is a large net profit, then the people in the Province pay less taxes, but often the money is applied to the maintenance of an asylum, the building and keeping up the provincial roads, and so forth, and Mr. Reusch says that the taxes upon the population are low on account of the profit made in lending money in this way. All the capital of this bank was originally borrowed upon bonds.

Considering the constant reference to the great success of Germany in establishing agricultural credit, these are instructive facts, and if we are to have no Government aid in the United States we should cease the use of Germany as a model.

ENGLAND.

In 1894 there was attempt made to transplant from Germany the Raifeisen system of cooperative credit in Ireland. After 17 years the report shows that in 1912 $282,720 was the total loan for that year. This is an illustration of the slowness of self-help. Landlordism had for many years been fastening itself upon the Irish farmer. The power of wealth and the traditional rites of ownership had built up a system of oppression that no self-help could make way against and secure relief for the poor farmers. Perceiving that it was idle to talk self-help to the helpless, the British Government in 1903 enacted a law and authorized the expenditure of £100,000,000 sterling and established the English estates commission, which under this act up to the year ending March, 1911, had expended $370,000,000. The borrower pays an annual rate, including interest and amortization, of 3¼ per cent. The loan fund is borrowed by the Government on its certificates at 2¾ per cent, redeemable in 30 years. A separate fund is provided from which in some cases expense for drainage, fences, stock, seeds, and implements are taken care of. The project includes the erection of about 25,000 farm cottages.

I quote from an address from Sir Horace Plunkett, president of the Irish Agricultural Organization Society, who, speaking of this as a "huge undertaking," says: "This, as no doubt you are aware, is now the accepted policy of all parties." He speaks of "the policy of strict abstention from any interference by government with the business of the people," as "withholding the kind of assistance which every other European government was giving to its farmers." Sir Horace refers to this failure to give assistance as the "laissez faire doctrine." He further states, referring to his studies respecting the agriculture future of America, "that while the state and the voluntary movement must advance side by side, and while the state must give its aid to the cooperative movement, it must seek to secure to that movement the greatest freedom."

FRANCE.

The Crédit Foncier of France was established in 1852. For the first years of its existence it was given a Government subsidy of 10,000,000 francs. Under the law of March 31, 1899, district agricultural credit banks were established and a lump sum of 40,000,000 francs and a yearly contribution of 3,000,000 francs placed at their disposal. This money was the tax placed upon the Bank of France as payment to the Government for its franchise, which was renewed in 1896. It has been stated that this was not Government money, but this is not true, as a tax had been collected for three years prior to its being contributed to the use of the agricultural banks. It is estimated that before the present franchise of France had expired that over 100,000,000 francs will have been contributed in this manner.

The result is in France that this action was an impetus to the establishment of agriculture credit societies of a cooperative character, which had never before been experienced in France, and which would not have been known except for Government loans.

A celebrated French writer, Mauric Dufourmantelle, who is evidently acquainted with conditions throughout Europe, says, speaking of Government aid, "Its action runs parallel with that of private initiative, each mutually completing the other."

Throughout all Europe, wherever self-help for the helpless has been permitted to drag its way over the obstacles interposed by an avaricious money-lending system, progress has been slow.

AUSTRIA.

Between the years 1869 and 1910, 669 public savings banks were organized in Austria. These banks had loaned on mortgages, in 1910, 3,763,345,000 crowns. This is taken from a statement made by the Austrian minister of agriculture. About 55 per cent of these loans were placed on farms.

There are 17 provincial banks in Austria, which have very little initial capital, but whose obligations, in fact all their liabilities, are guaranteed by the provincial or state governments. In 1910 these institutions had issued debentures, which were guaranteed by the governments, amounting to 1,537,819,000 crowns. Over 80 per cent of these debentures represented agriculture loans. Lending at a very low rate of interest, these banks in 1910 showed a net profit of 3,126,000 crowns. The minister states:

> It has been demonstrated by experience that the provincial banks have never suffered losses in compulsory realization of their claims. The mortgages, the assets of the bank, and the Province with its taxes serve as guaranties for the debentures. * * * Agriculture prefers the credit of the provincial banks to all other sources of credit, because they offer the lowest and most stable rates of interest and because loans are amortizable in small annuities. * * * It is impossible for private parties to make amortizable loans for small amounts. * * * An excessive rate of interest is irreconcilable with amortization in agricultural transactions. * * * These institutions are characteristic of Austria, and merit the attention of countries where the greatest possible freedom of the individual and the vigorous development of the State as a whole are to be found working harmoniously together.

Speaking of the rise of price of land, which is a condition existing throughout all of Europe, and regarding the conjecture of some that this increase of land values might be due to "increased credit to the farmers by reason of the land mortgage and Raiffeisen systems," the minister says:

It has nothing to do with the rise in price of land. The reasons are, increasing population and increase of consumption.

Dr. Moritz Weden, speaking of Government loans in Austria, says:

The cooperative movement, for the Government aid which has been rendered to it, has in turn rendered abundant cooperative aid to the Government.

RUSSIA.

In 1895 the Peasants' Land Mortgage Bank in Russia was given power to purchase entire estates from landlords, and was given special capital for this purpose by the Crown. Up to 1912, 53,000,000 acres of land had been thus purchased and cut into tracts averaging from 21 to 27 acres. The payments of the purchases of these small tracts run as long as 55½ years, and the annual payments, including amortization and cost of administration, amounts to about 4½ per cent. The Russian Government secures this money by the issue of its bonds. Both the institutions of the Raiffeisen and Schulze-Delitzsch type since 1895 have been assisted by Government funds, and their recent growth has been very rapid. The State Government of Russia has established central State banks, which lend a certain portion of the foundation capital to the credit societies at 4½ per cent interest.

HUNGARY.

The entire Hungarian agriculture policy is State endowed. Aside from performing every duty of Government in the direction of education, which is carried on in the United States and every other leading country, Hungary pursues a policy of substantial help through giving financial means to perform the work which it has taught the farmers how to do. The work is carried on mainly through the State-controlled National Small Holdings Land Mortgage Institute, the Central Hungarian Credit Cooperative Society, and the National Association of Hungarian Land Mortgage Institutions. Mortgage debentures are guaranteed by the Government. The outstanding loans on agricultural real estate in 1907 is estimated at over $822,000,000. It is stated that when the cooperative movement in Hungary, and when discussions as to whether Government loans should be instituted, were under way that "the country banks left no stone unturned to prevent this movement which they believed seriously threatened their business." This belief proved to be later on manifestly erroneous. In fact a study of European private-bank conditions reveals the fact that their business is still profitably conducted in the presence of cooperative credit and Government aid for farmers. In many of the countries where the rate of interest on farm mortgages is as low as 4½ per cent, private joint-stock mortgage companies have gone into the business, conducting it at the low rate, and have paid substantial dividends. The largest joint-stock land-mortgage company in the world, located in Germany, has paid dividends for years averaging around 8 to 9 per cent, with a margin between the cost of money and the rate at which it was loaned of one-quarter of 1 per cent. None of these companies, however, have engaged in the business on this basis until Government loans and cooperation had led the way.

ITALY.

There are three public banks in Italy, namely, the Bank of Naples, the Bank of Sicily, and the Savings Bank of Milan. These banks have numerous branches which are increasing. They are entirely altruistic institutions, have no shareholders, and pay no profits except to the State. Under the 1907 law, by a special tax 4,000,000 lire was turned over to the Bank of Sicily. The rate of interest upon agricultural loans, including interest and amortization, is usually 5½ per cent. Formerly the rate of interest to farmers in Sicily was often as high as 60 per cent. The farmers of Sicily were no worse off than many of the poor farmers in the United States at the present time.

SWITZERLAND.

There are 23 banks in Switzerland which are furnished with capital of the various States or Cantons. This capital is either drawn from the Government treasury or by the issue of the bonds of the State. As an example, the Zurich Canton Bank was established in 1870 with a capital of 6,000,000 francs, taken from the public treasury. This capital has been since increased to 20,000,000 francs by the issue of Canton bonds. The Canton Bank of Zurich is governed by a board of directors composed of 13 members appointed by the Government. There are also private banks, joint-stock, and cooperative banks, but the rate of interest and terms are higher than that of the Government bank. One-half the profit of these public banks goes to the reserve fund and the other half to the State. These banks, in lending money on farm property, deal directly with the farmer in his individual capacity. The interest rate varies from 4 to 4½ per cent and the terms as long as 59 years.

DENMARK.

The Government of Denmark since 1899 has loaned 25,000,000 crowns directly to the farmers of that country. It is increasing this loan at the rate of 4,000,000 per year, charging interest at 3 per cent. This work has been conducted on the theory that the main expenditure should be for the small farmer to help him build his own home and become independent. It loans up to 90 per cent of the appraised valuation of the property. Operating for 14 years on this plan, very few small loans have had to be taken over because of failure to meet the obligation. The total loss during these years amounts to only one two hundred and fiftieths of 1 per cent of the total amount loaned. This method of fostering small landowners has been of great advantage to the large farmers, because of the increase in country population and consequent increase of farm hands.

NORWAY.

In the city of Christiania is located the Mortgage Bank of the Kingdom of Norway. Its capital belongs to the State, which, under the agreement, the Government can not recall until after the bank has "fulfilled all its undertakings." All bonds issued by this bank are the obligation of the Government. Loans are made up to 60 per cent of the value of the property mortgaged for a term of 40 years at 4½ per cent interest. The administration of the bank is in the hands of a board of directors chosen by the Norway Parliament and nominated by the King.

NEW ZEALAND.

In 1894 New Zealand passed a law known as the advances act, which was put into operation in 1895. Up to this date it has loaned over $60,000,000 at interest rates around 4 and 4½ per cent. The loan fund has been mainly produced by the issue of Government bonds, upon which an interest rate was paid running from 3 to 3½ per cent.

Prior to the passage of this law farmers were paying over 8 per cent interest, and the money lenders were contending that it was cheap enough. Since the law went into operation these same money lenders have continued to lend money, but at the rate given on Government loans. In 1911 the total expense of carrying on the business was fifteen one-hundredths of 1 per cent. In the year 1912 the loan department showed a net profit of over $300,000. In the Appendix to the Journals of the House of Representatives of New Zealand for the second session a statement of profit and expenses for the year ending March 31, 1906, shows gross profits as—translated from pounds, shillings, and pence—$193,175. The total expense of the advances department is given at $22,193, which is about 55 cents for each $500 of outstanding loans. The net profits were approximately $170,236. The cost of management in 1911, which is given as the outside average, was 75 cents on each $500 loaned. This is about fifteen one-hundredths of 1 per cent, and conforms very closely to the management cost reported from other countries. In 1911 the report showed a loss on one account amounting to $265. It was also stated in the report that there was two securities on hand which were not satisfactory. For the 15 years of the operation of the plan a total of 32 foreclosures have been made out of a total of 16,005 loans.

The same opposition to Government loans which has been instituted in all countries by those who are lending money and thought their profits might be curtailed was waged fiercely in New Zealand. No political party in New Zealand now opposes the system. No political party in Germany or England now opposes a like system. In New Zealand Government loans have been of inestimable advantage to agriculture, and this is also true of other countries.

The United States consul to New Zealand says, in a report made in 1897:

The loans have been a great boon to struggling farmers, who were paying as high as 8 per cent on their mortgages. Immediately this money became available interest came tumbling down to 4 per cent for good freehold security.

Mr. Henry Demarest Lloyd, an English writer on economic subjects, says:

The world over one of the greatest obstacles in the way of the small farmer, and the large one, is the difficulty of getting capital. Often there is no money to be borrowed in the district where he lives, or if there is, it is in the hands of rich neighbors or banks, who know nothing but their bond and the pound of flesh. But in New Zealand the settler has only to go to the nearest post office to get into communication with a money lender, who charges no commission or brokerage, and no fees, except for actual expenses, never exacts usury, offers no cut-throat mortgages for signatures, will let him have any amount from as little as $125 to as much as $15,000, does not try to induce him to borrow more than he really needs, gives him 36½ years to pay the money back, and accepts it from him in small installments on the principal with every payment of interest, so as to make it as little of a burden as can be; will allow him, if he happens to have $25 to spare, to pay it at any time to reduce his indebtedness, and when it finds itself making a profit out of its business, instead of accumulating a fortune, gives him the benefit by reducing his rate.

AUSTRALIA.

All of the six States of Australia make Government loans to farmers. The progress of these loans is well evidenced by the fact that total loans of the six States were $25,869,555 in 1908, $30,692,660 in 1909, $35,337,870 in 1910, $40,315,360 in 1911. The first laws instituting this system of loans were passed in 1896, and the total of loans given for these four years fairly represents the increase for the other periods. The total profit which had accumulated up to and including 1911 was $958,600. About three-fifths of the applications have been accepted and the loans made upon them. The loan fund is provided throughout the States generally by the issue of Government bonds bearing interest of not to exceed 4 per cent. Much of this is borrowed at 3½ per cent, and a small portion at 4 per cent. The average rate payable on the aggregate indebtedness of the Australian States is a little less than 3¾ per cent. The rate of interest to farmer borrowers is from 4 to 5 per cent, including amortization, and the running period of the debt is from 5 to 36½ years, with privilege to pay the entire debt under prescribed rules, which include a notice of such intention by the borrower of from 30 to 60 days.

SOUTH AFRICA.

The three States of Natal, Orange Free State, and Transvaal, for the purpose of more perfectly carrying out a system of Government loans, by the act of 1912 agreed to establish the Land and Agriculture Bank of South Africa. This bank took over assets and agricultural loan funds of these States. Funds are procured by direct appropriation, and by the issue of Government bonds up to the year 1909 amounted to about $40,000,000. The average loans have been about $1,700, which is very close to the average mortgage debt of farms in the United States. Since the act of August 19, 1907, the Transvaal has loaned about $10,000,000 at rates of interest of 5 per cent or less. The net profit reported in 1912 in the inspector's report was $280,000.

CANADA.

By act of May 3, 1912, in Nova Scotia, whenever a borrower could secure a loan for 50 per cent the Government was empowered to guarantee an additional loan of 30 per cent. The law permitted the Government to purchase farm land, subdivide it into farm lots, erect buildings and fences, and sell such parcels and lots to farmers on such terms as might be approved by the governor. The governor in council is permitted to make regulations for carrying the act into effect and borrow the money required on the credit of the Province.

A similar act for New Brunswick was passed April 20, 1912, and a farm-settlement board was empowered to buy, improve, and sell land to settlers. Buyers were required to pay 25 per cent of the price in cash and the balance in 10 years, with an extension clause.

Sir Arthur Hawks, commissioner of immigration, appointed by the Canadian minister of the interior, in 1911 said:

> The financing of a settlement as a function of government seems now to be inevitable. It contains nothing revolutionary in principle. It would be difficult, for those dividends which are founded on Government guaranties and subsidies, to oppose application in Canada of a principle that is operated in the United Kingdom, Australia, and New Zealand, and is about to be applied in South Africa. * * * The Government factor in the use of public credit is an object to be achieved and not the incidental advantage that may alight on an individual here and there.

PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Under an act of March 4, 1907, the Philippine Government was authorized to guarantee for 25 years a yearly income of 4 per cent upon private capital invested in agricultural banks and to be loaned to the Philippine farmer.

The passage of the law was all that it amounted to. The same thing happened there that will happen to any private profit-making land-mortgage bank scheme in the United States in those localities where the rate of interest now brings a larger profit than can be made by lending money through this kind of a mortgage bank.

In those districts where generally the demand for lower interest is not great the banks will not be established, and many a poor farmer not so fortunate as others will have no assistance.

The prevailing rate of interest in the Philippine Islands was so high that a guaranty of 4 per cent did not attract private capital, and none came forward to invest in the new mortgage-bank scheme. The result was that this guaranty law brought no assistance to those for whom assistance was intended.

On June 1, 1907, by act No. 1865, the Philippine Government, on the advice of United States Attorney General Bonaparte as to the constitutionality of the proceeding, established a Government agricultural bank and provided it with a capital of $500,000 from Government funds. This bank began operation in October, 1908. The minister of finance and justice in his 1910 report states:

> One of the good results already accomplished consists in the decrease of usury in the Provinces.

In that report the bank shows a total net profit of 31,477.18 pesos. In 1912, the report stated that the profit was 52,950.87 pesos. The bank had 12 agencies in 1912. (See also 1913 report.)

On February 3, 1913, a law was enacted by the Philippine Legislature which gave a monopoly of land-mortgage banks to some prominent bankers. This law seems to have been devised to exclude the Government bank. These bankers were those who refused to accept the 4 per cent guaranty and who opposed the Government loans. The Governor General refused to approve this law and it did not go in force.

These bankers were willing to do the business at a reduced interest rate after it was forced upon them by the Government bank. This is a concrete illustration of the spirit with which any private bank will execute a government policy.

Their whole purpose is profit and they care nothing for the public welfare.

In volume 26, Opinions of the Attorney General, page 593, in a letter transmitted to the Governor of the Philippine Islands, Attorney General Bonaparte reviewed authorities and precedents bearing upon the right, under the Constitution, to establish a Government bank and lend Government funds to our little brown brothers. Some people are of the opinion that we should do as well for our white American farmer.

These sufficiently specific instances of Government loans as practiced in European countries, which have had longer and more experience than ourselves in the battle for sufficient food, are enough to demonstrate the practicability of Government loans in the United States. I have shown that the practice of lending money to farmers is world-wide, of long duration, and profitable. It seems that any additional evidence to prove that Government loans to farmers is not new or novel or that it is salutary in effect would be unnecessary. However, I will add the testimony of our United States commission, which recently made its report of its labor in Europe to this Congress. I quote from this report:

> In every instance in Europe where Government capital has been granted to establish mortgage credit the results have been favorable to the agricultural interests of that nation.

It is strange to the uninitiated why these facts have not been more thoroughly dwelt upon by the many who have presumed to lead in the education of the public and our legislators toward the adoption of the right kind of farm credit system for this country. The first information officially promulgated in this country came from our French ambassador, Mr. Myron T. Herrick, who was instructed by President Taft to act as chairman of an ambassadorial commission investigating farm credit in Europe. In the ambassador's report much space is occupied by a quotation from a European writer known to be an antagonist of government loans. No space was given to the details of government loans which I have presented.

The ambassador, who is also ex-president of the American Bankers' Association, in speaking of what the American farmer needs and of Government aid, says:

> Fortunately for this country, he does not need it, nor would he accept it.

Since the ambassador's report was published the American farmer has plainly expressed himself as knowing what he needs and what he would accept. The American Grange in its last convention, at Manchester, Vt., passed a resolution indorsing Government loans. The Farmers' Union and the Grange sent their legislative committees to Washington, and they went before the committee considering farm credit legislation and supported Government loans to farmers on farm first mortgages.

Some have tried to make it appear that Government loans to food producers would be antagonized by labor and other food consumers in the city. How thoroughly they are mistaken is made very plain by the indorsement of H. R. 11897 by the American Federation of Labor in executive council assembled at Washington in January.

In a review of the Moss-Fletcher bill printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 29, in the face of the above declarations expressed by more than 2,000,000 farmers of this country, we read that—

> The farmers of the country do not desire any special privileges, and the idea of special privilege is, moreover, antagonistic to the spirit of our institutions.

It is true that the farmers do not ask for any special privilege, and it is also true that it is nearly time for all of us to learn that the farmers can tell us themselves what they do or "do not desire." If they desire Government loans, they ask only a privilege now given to bankers.

This information of what the farmers "do not desire" comes in touch in the same review with a proposal to create a new system of farm-land banks and give to bankers the very extraordinary "special privilege" of exemption from taxation.

The authors of the Moss-Fletcher bill have strained the Constitution of the United States to the breaking point in an effort to remove the tax obstacle which must inevitably be a serious hindrance to the operation of any private land-mortgage bank.

A tax on mortgages of itself operates against a low rate of interest. Any tax upon the mortgage must be added to the interest rate. The injection into the scheme of bonds or debentures, necessary to liquefy mortgage security, creates a new taxable wealth and adds another factor tending to increase the interest rate. In other words, the tax on the mortgage plus the tax on the debenture must be added to the interest rate. In order to cure this difficulty these bills include in section 18 the most drastic demonstration of paternalism possible. It is distinctly special legislation for private profit.

For these so-called national farm-land corporations, which are private profit-sharing institutions in every sense, this section exempts from taxation their "capital stock and surplus therein and the income derived therefrom and the mortgages and deeds of trust and notes and bonds secured thereby held by said bank and the national land-bank bonds issued by the same."

This section repeals the income-tax law in its application to individuals who have income from these banking institutions and in its application to the income of the corporation itself. It renders nugatory the law of States which tax the capital stock of corporations. The tax exemption includes the profits of these banks and the profits of individuals who make their investments solely for profits, and who have no regard for the great national policy of conservation of agriculture and the perpetuation of our food supply.

These exemptions are totally without the warrant of a great national beneficence. The Nation might be justified in making these exemptions for the good of the whole people, but to make them for the benefit of a few bankers is special legislation of the rankest type.

If these tax exemptions are read into law, on what theory can this Government refuse to exempt the notes, bonds, income, and surplus profits of every other bank? The only theory upon which the assets of these private banks can be exempted from taxation is that they are instrumentalities of Government. The Supreme Court has long since declared the national banks are instrumentalities of Government. How can we refuse, then, to exempt them from taxation? The new banking and currency act has made these national banks more than ever the instrumentalities of Government and given greater reason why we may expect the national bankers to cry out for "equal rights."

If a private bank lending money to farmers in order to aid the production of food is an instrumentality of Government, is not the farmer who pays the profit on these loans and who actually raises the food also an instrumentality of Government? Why not exempt the farmers from taxation?

If the Moss-Fletcher bill should become a law, these banks will be permitted to receive general deposits, State funds, Government funds, may act as fiscal agent of the United States, and do "a general banking business as far as its current deposits are concerned."

The interest rate in these bills is uncertain. It will depend upon what the new class of debentures bring in the market. It is by no means sure that the rate will be lower than now. From 1886 to 1894 there were nearly 150 land-mortgage bond companies in the United States, and none of them are now left to tell the tale of mismanagement, dishonesty, and consequent low price of their bonds.

Suppose we take this great Government policy, of the utmost importance to residents of the city as well as of the country, and turn it over to private banking institutions, what will be the effect upon interest rates? What class of investors in these banking enterprises will have charge of the policy?

As a general class the money lenders of this country are responsible for much obstruction to agriculture. Many of them are the simon-pure shylocks of the country. These men know the open highways and underground routes to the money market. They know the lending game in all its sinister aspects and are further from being philanthropists than any other class of business men in all the world. They know the devious methods by which interest rates have been augmented by the cost of money and all the petty and tricky ways by which this cost has been increased to their profit. They know the laws forbidding usury have been circumvented in every State, and they know how to do it better than any other class of people.

From this class of people will come the investors in a private bank farm-credit plan if the bill suits them. They will be at the money counter, and their familiar faces will greet the farmer borrower wherever these banks are established. The main difference will be that they will represent themselves to their victims as possessing a brand of virtue duly certified and indorsed by the Government.

If the bill does not suit them and is not "for" them, they will not invest.

These people will care nothing for the Government policy intrusted to their tender mercies. Privately or as a part of the banking institution, they will be engaged in land deals and financing operations. Almost every financial institution having in charge the people's money is a center to which comes tempting prospects for profit to the persons who have the power to decide to whom loans shall be made, with the result that favoritism and the prosperity of the lenders, instead of the borrowers, will be the guiding factor in this decision.

What laws can we make that will prevent such a banker from telling an applicant that "the funds are all loaned up," regardless of whether they are or not, and turning the borrower into the clutches of one of these "side-line lenders" which are adjuncts of most of the banks of to-day?

What law can you make to prevent these bankers from forcing the borrower into the hands of certain surveyors, abstract makers, and lawyers where the same old game of raising the cost, if not the interest rate, will go on? If you can make such laws, an elaborate inspection force at the expense of our taxpayers must be builded up in order to enforce them—to watch the profit makers whom we are to trust to carry out the Government policy.

If by any means a private bank farm-credit institution could be organized and so inspected and regulated that the rate of interest will be low, I am of the opinion that there will be few investors in such a bank. Particularly would this be true in those locations where money is now being let at a high rate where relief is most needed, but where lenders get the greatest profit. To make a law which will not entice investors means that all this Federal Government will have done to carry out this important national policy is the mere making of a law from which no action would follow.

It will be in the same catagory as our present banking and currency bill, which depends for its success upon whether or not the bankers will conform to it. It will be in the same category, but possessing less force, for the reason it can have no control over private individuals and may not inflict any alternative upon them whatever should they choose not to invest.

Shall we lure investors into these new banks by giving them special privilege in the matter of exemption from taxation?

If farm credit can be solely conducted for the purpose of carrying out a national policy, and is not associated with private business for profit, it would be another matter and "public policy" would be sufficient ground for removing the tax from bonds and mortgages.

If it is not class legislation and paternalism to exempt from taxation the stocks, notes, bonds, income, and surplus of a private bank, who will have the nerve to say that Government loans to farmers is class legislation?

In spite of the most rigid regulation and inspection, some of these banks will fail and their debentures drop in value. When that occurs in one State it will affect the value of debentures in every other State, and even if the public confidence is won at the outset of this plan it will require but one or two failures in the whole country to seriously impair this confidence. Even though we put these mortgages, the security upon which the debentures are based, in the hands of a public trustee, the question of management still enters as an important factor into their value. The public will not be reassured of the value of a debenture merely because some official may stamp on its face the statement that the mortgages which the debentures represent are in his hands. Either public confidence or suspicion will rest upon the question as to whether the management that appraised the land against which the mortgage is given is honest and efficient or not. The public knows that we have had national inspection of national banks and other safeguards, but it also knows that national banks have failed because of both mismanagement and dishonesty.

What glamour will be thrown around this new style of bank that will gain more confidence from the public for them than is given to national banks?

It will not materially improve the market value of these debentures to make them legally acceptable as trust-fund investments. No law can be made that will insure the value of any investment, and to pass such a law for the purpose of upholding the value of these debentures is very liable to become a cruel imposition upon and loss to the widows and orphans throughout the country.

The private-bank plan of farm credit is not a thoroughbred. It is part public policy and part greed. It can be nothing but an abortive attempt to hitch altruism with avarice.

The way to carry out a national policy is for the Nation itself to do it as nearly as possible and not turn it over to private interests as much as possible.

As a foundation for any farm-mortgage loan plan we should have a power with stability unquestioned now; not one requiring a generation in which to gain the confidence of the people and make the remedy efficient against the evil we wish to cure.

Such a power can establish at once the best possible market for the bonds or debentures required to liquefy mortgage security, at once solve the problem of tax upon mortgages and debentures, at once institute a low rate of interest and decrease the cost to the lowest possible minimum, at once provide an adequate supply of money at the lowest possible cost, at once place mortgage bonds upon a footing with the very best security known in the world, at once begin the work of relief aimed at all over the country instead of in a few places.

This power exists and is none other than the Federal Government. This is the central authority of the people. It is the apex authority covering all the units of cooperative government. If we wish to institute an effective farm-credit system, why should we defer wholly to the unrelated efforts of these units? Why should we suffer the long waiting for these units to coordinate on this great purpose when the apex authority can do it at once? These various units are free to perform this service as they wish, but the Federal Government should at least so act that the waiting for State action shall be a season of accomplishment and not one of procrastination, that the country may be covered by the policy in a complete instead of a desultory manner.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

[Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, "This is the day I long have sought and mourned because I found it not." For years before I became a Member of Congress I was an earnest believer in and advocate of the principle of Government aid for the improvement of post roads of the Nation. As far back as 1904, the first time I was a candidate for Congress, I pledged my people that I would stand for this principle, and I rejoice to know that this pledge is about to be consummated in the enactment of one of the sanest, wisest, and most beneficent pieces of legislation ever written upon the statute books of the United States. I remember well that in the Sixtieth Congress a little band of us who were in favor of the principle were denounced upon the floor of the House as being Socialists and almost anarchists for standing for this principle, and I am exceedingly glad to see the wave of public opinion roll on and on until at last the appeals of a deserving class of people are about to be heard in the enactment of the pending bill. This but demonstrates the rapidity with which great movements grow when public opinion gets behind them; it moves onward and upward with an ever irresistible rush that no power on earth can check.

I became a Member of the Sixtieth Congress, and soon thereafter introduced a bill proposing Government aid for the improvement of post roads, and introduced a similar bill at each Congress thereafter. It has been a pleasure to do what I could to aid and further the pending legislation. The bill proposes to expend an amount of money not to exceed $25,000,000 each year in "constructing and maintaining" the post roads of the United States, the States to share in it on certain conditions, one of the conditions being that the States must put a like amount of money into the improvement of the highways of the States. There are about 2,200,000 miles of post roads in the United States. To macadamize these roads, it is estimated, would cost $45,000,000,000, a staggering and appalling sum of money. Of this 2,200,000 miles of post roads, Indiana has approximately 67,000 miles. No one contemplates for a moment doing this work at once, or even in the near future. We realize the huge task and undertaking that lies before us in the improvement of the highways and that we must approach the question slowly, conservatively, but surely, with a firm basis on which to stand. The bill is designed to stimulate the States in improving their roads and to aid them to some extent. This amount of money, large though it is, yet is a small amount as compared to the amount the States and civil subdivisions of the States will put into the construction and improvement of their respective highways. It is hoped that the two working together, hand in hand, each putting a sufficient amount of money into the improvement of highways each year, in the course of the next decade or two we will see countless hundreds of thousands of miles of highway rocked and macadamized in the States.

Twenty-five or thirty years ago the State of Indiana recognized the necessity of improving its highways; it did not wait for Government aid, but boldly alone it launched upon this much-needed legislation. The legislature passed what is, in my judgment, the best road law to be found upon the statute books of any State in the Union, and I have read all of them. The board of commissioners in my State has charge and control of the highways, and under our law when 100 freeholders residing in the township petition the board of commissioners for the right to improve the highways in the township the board of commissioners refers it back to the people of the township; an election is held, and if a majority of the voters of the township declare in favor of the principle, then the law permits bonds to be issued upon the real and personal property of the township to the amount of 4 per cent of the value of the property. These bonds bear 4½ per cent interest, redeemable in from 1 to 20 years, and are not subject to taxation. Under this system the improvement of highways in Indiana has moved forward until to-day, in proportion as its population is to the population of the United States, and in proportion to its total mileage of rural post roads, it has more miles of improved roads than any other State in the Union. I recently addressed a letter to the Bureau of Good Roads in the Agricultural Department for data showing the total amount of bonds issued under our law during the last 20 years for the improvement of highways, and the total number of miles of improved roads in the State of Indiana, and their letter shows that Indiana has township and county bonds outstanding amounting to $53,904,392, and of the 67,996 miles of post roads in the State of Indiana we have macadamized and gravel roads amounting to 24,956 miles, more than one-third of the total amount of post roads in the State improved by local taxation. The average cost of building macadam or gravel roads in the State of Indiana is approximately $2,500 per mile. This has been a great drain and expense on the farmers of the State of Indiana, yet it has improved their condition more than any other legislation ever passed by the legislature of the State. Mr. Chairman, it is impossible to enumerate all the good that will ultimately flow from this legislation. Time alone must write this chapter in the future history of our country. If this work be continued in the future as I hope it will be, posterity will rise up and call us blessed.

The letters referred to are as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF PUBLIC ROADS,
Washington, D. C., January 22, 1914.

Hon. W. E. COX,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of January 20, in which you request information in regard to bond issues for roads and bridges by counties and townships in your State.

We have just completed the compilation of information on this subject, and I therefore take pleausre in furnishing it to you, as follows:

Total bond issues by counties and districts	$18,072,044
Total bond issues by townships	35,837,348
Total	53,909,392

This does not include all the bonds that have been isused in Indiana, for the reason that the bonds have been paid off in many instances and in some cases there is no record, except for bonds outstanding.

During the year 1912 various counties and townships in Indiana issued $2,385,143 for roads and bridges and during the year 1913 they issued $4,705,797. These figures are all subject to error, as it is almost impossible to get accurate information on this subject. Most of the bonds above referred to have been issued during the past 20 years.

Very respectfully,

P. F. J. WILSON, Acting Director.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF PUBLIC ROADS,
Washington, D. C., January 28, 1914.

Hon. W. E. COX,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your letter of January 26. Allow me to say in reply that the total mileage of roads constructed in Indiana from the bond issues mentioned in our letter of January 22—that is, $53,909,393—can not be furnished by this office. Complete returns have been received from a number of counties and townships from which it is found that the cost of roads built by the bond issues averages between $2,400 and $2,500 per mile. These returns are from an expenditure of $2,670,447 in 15 counties only and of $2,562,380 in 21 townships only. If this total expenditure in counties and townships of $5,232,827 at an average rate of about $2,432 per mile is taken to represent the average expenditure per mile on the entire amount of bonds issued, there should have been constructed apparently a total of about 22,000 miles of roads. I inclose for your information a list of the county and township bonds above referred to.

Our records show that there were in Indiana in 1904, 20,582 miles of gravel road and 3,295 miles of stone road and in 1909, 20,509 miles of gravel road and 4,398 miles of stone road. Revised figures for 1913 indicate 24,956 miles of improved roads in the State, with a total mileage of all roads of 67,996. It is quite probable that the figures of mileage for 1904 were too large. In any case, however, it would appear that somewhat more than 20,000 miles of gravel and stone roads may be taken as an estimate on the mileage constructed with the total bond issues.

With reference to the 4 per cent tax feature, I assume that you refer to the percentage of total valuation which must not be exceeded by all bonded indebtedness in any township, according to sections 7725–7732 of Burn's Annotated Statutes of Indiana for 1908 and amendments of 1909.

Trusting that I have in some measure answered your inquiry and that you will call on me for further information if you need it, I am,

Very respectfully,

Prepared by Office of Public Roads, January 27, 1914. Subject to revision.

Mr. COX. The farmer has not besieged legislatures of the States, nor has he sought special favors at the hands of Congress. They have been content with their daily toil, and have gone on, moved forward, trusting these questions to their representatives. Living, in a measure, an isolated life, most of the time far removed from the great centers of population, they have been too busy devoting themselves to the cultivation of the soil to pay but little, if any, attention to the legislation pending here or in other legislative bodies throughout the Nation. Other interests have been diligent in seeking, and often procuring, special legislation inuring to their direct and immediate benefit. For half a century the manufacturers of the country sought and importuned Congress for a high protective tariff, arguing and advocating the doctrine that they were unable to compete with foreign competitors unless their industries were "hothoused" and protected by high protective tariff; and in order to maintain this unjust and inequitable policy their representatives for half a century besieged Congress to protect them and their infant industries, as was shown by the startling disclosures in the recent Mulhall investigation, showing that tremendous sums of money were annually raised and a powerful lobby maintained at Washington at each session of Congress, especially when a revision of the tariff was under consideration; and I am sorry to say that Congress, yielding to these insidious arguments of the manufacturers, permitted to remain upon the statute books a law which gave to them direct and immediate benefits, increasing their profits and dividends upon their capital invested at the expense of the enormous class of people living in the country.

Special interests have been diligent in seeing to it that laws were enacted both by the legislatures of the States and Congress of the United States that would inure to their immediate benefit. This has ever been in rule in the past, and I fear will continue to be the rule; but through a master stroke of President Wilson, in uttering one sentence, "Lobbies—of course everyone knows there are insidious lobbies maintained at Washington"—from that day the business of the professional lobbyist has become unpopular, and, thank God, he has almost disappeared.

Special interests sought and procured aid in the building of great trunk-line railroads in this country in the past, and between the years 1864 and 1882 no less than 155,000,000 acres of land were given away to aid in the construction and building of trunk-line railroads in the West and Southwest which, if the people owned to-day, would be worth countless billions of dollars. This but shows how special interests, well organized, quick, and alert to look after their own interests, can forge ahead and profit at the expense of their less fortunate kinsmen who are unorganized, living remotely in the country, and paying no attention to legislation. It is now and has been for some years the custom of Congress to appropriate approximately $50,000,000 per year to improve the rivers and harbors of the Nation, and yet the rivers and harbors would be useless as arteries of commerce were it not for the farmers' commodities to be shipped thereon.

We have now completed the Panama Canal at an approximate cost of $400,000,000, the cost and upkeep of which will be a tremendous burden upon the taxpayers of the Nation for all time to come. I am not criticizing the building of the canal, but the country people have patiently borne their part of the cost of this great project, with only an indirect benefit in return. Each year Congress appropriates approximately $100,000,000 for the maintenance of the Army and $150,000,000 for the upkeep of the Navy. These tremendous sums of money must be paid largely by the farming element of the Nation, and can only be paid by taxes imposed upon them directly and indirectly. While taxation has fallen upon all the people, yet special interests, ever looking to their own welfare, have ever been on the alert in having a large proportion of the taxes appropriated in some way and some manner to serve their use and benefit. The argument is made, "We need an Army and a strong Navy to protect the trade and commerce of our Nation," and yet the trade and commerce of the Nation is largely made up of the farmer's commodities, raised by him upon his farm, and the system of levying taxes and making appropriations has gone on in some degree throughout the last century without a corresponding equitable distribution of the appropriation so made as to serve all the people as nearly equitable as possible. While the system of levying and collecting taxes has been on both sides of the ledger, yet I believe the system of appropriating the money has largely been on one side, and that one side represented by heretofore largely protected interests. This system has gone on in some degree for a century, and during this period of time our fathers and forefathers living in the country meekly and mildly submitted without a murmur or protest upon their part, and continued to pay tribute in the way of taxes for the support and maintenance not only of governmental functions, but in many cases purely private enterprises.

Is it not time that we turn and look to the interest and welfare of this class of people by aiding them in improving and maintaining their highways? To improve and maintain the highways of the States is a task too big, huge, and tremendous for the States to accomplish themselves, and they ought to have aid and assistance along this line from the Government. Each one that uses the highways in a State is taxed to maintain them, and as the Government of the United States uses these highways as post routes six days out of each week, and every week in the year, it is but fair and just that the Government contribute a small part not only to the construction of these roads, but their maintenance as well. Mr. Chairman, if the rivers would cease to flow, and if the railroads were destroyed, so long as we had highways over which our farmers could haul their produce to market no one in the great centers of population would suffer the pangs of hunger for a minute, because the farmer, with his energy, thrift, and industry, would see to it that his produce was hauled there by wagons and teams. The farmers during the last decade have become prosperous, and I rejoice to know it, but they have not become prosperous as the result of legislation inuring to their immediate benefit, but they have become prosperous in spite of legislation, as well as in spite of conditions. [Applause.]

For a quarter of a century every campaign has been fought on the tariff question with occasionally an incidental side issue thrown in. I have believed for years that the real question in this country was and is the country-life question. I believe and have believed for years that this is and was the foremost question of the day. We are confronted to-day with a frightful if not dangerous condition of affairs in the Nation. We behold cities far outgrowing in population the country, a danger signal to any nation. Another danger, the boys and girls of the country, tired of isolation, tired of country life, desirous of improving their social welfare, are daily leaving the country and in streams pouring into the already overcrowded cities. How to overcome this, and induce the boy and girl to remain in the country upon the farm, and how to teach them to produce more of the necessaries of life is, in my judgment, the supreme question of the hour and far eclipses, as an economic question, all the trust and financial questions combined. If we will look more to the country life, improve conditions among the farmers, induce the boy and girl to remain there, and make their homes in the country for the future instead of leaving it, and going to the cities, in a few years they will solve all the trust and financial questions of the country that need be solved by growing larger crops, bringing bounty, peace, happiness, and prosperity not only to themselves but to a grateful population living in the cities.

For quite a while great automobile manufacturers and automobile owners have conducted a strenuous campaign at a tremendous cost to induce Congress to build a great automobile road from ocean to ocean, and from the Lakes to the Gulf costing not less than $200,000,000, on which the "idle rich" can spend their "idle time," and conceive plans and schemes whereby they can get more ill-gotten gains from the toiling masses of the people. Mr. Chairman, I am unalterably opposed to this, under any and all conditions, and under no circumstances whatever would I ever vote one dollar for such a measure as this. The man I want to help, aid, and assist is the man wearing "blue overalls" and "brogan shoes," who, with his shovel, his hoe, and his plow, toils 16 hours every day in order to benefit not only himself but to raise bountiful crops, thereby alleviate suffering, want, and misery in the cities of the Nation. This is the fellow I want to help, and this is the fellow this bill proposes to help. Under it Indiana will get, if enacted into a law, approximately $1,000,000 per year to aid in the construction of new roads and in maintaining the roads already constructed under the law of Indiana. Section 3 of this bill proposes to aid the States in the construction of new roads, while section 4 proposes to aid the States in maintaining roads already improved, and under the pending bill it will be up to the governors of the respective States to elect whether they propose to accept aid to construct new roads under section 3 or aid to maintain roads under section 4 of the pending measure, or he is given the option under the pending bill to select aid for the construction of new roads or for the maintenance of roads already constructed, or both. [Applause.]

If the governors of the States propose to accept, under section 4 of the proposed bill, all macadamized roads will receive $60 per mile per year, and all gravel and shell roads $30 per mile per year, and all dirt roads $15 per mile per year for their maintenance. If enacted into a law, this bill will, in my judgment, go further toward overcoming dangerous conditions, and forces now at work in this country than any other legislation ever attempted by Congress. I believe it will stop, or at least have a tendency to check, the rapid decrease of population in country life, and induce the people to stay, and remain in the country. The farmers are to-day the financial masters of the Nation. This was demonstrated in the panic of 1907, when Wall Street, without a moment's warning, brought on a bankers' panic, and practically all the banks of the Nation suspended payment. This condition lasted until the farmers' crops went abroad, and when they reached foreign soil ships could scarcely haul the gold back to this country, and when it reached America Wall Street immediately surrendered, and we heard no more of the panic.

The report of the Secretary of Agriculture shows that the total value of farmers' commodities last year was upward of $9,000,000,000, a sum of money so large that no mortal mind can comprehend it. This sum represents ten times the total capitalization of all the national banks of the United States, nearly one-half of the total banking power of the United States, and nearly two-thirds of the total value of all the steam railroads in the United States. These commodities had to be hauled to market, the average haul being about 9½ miles, and they had to be hauled over highways many times almost impassable on account of mud; yet the farmers by their industry succeeded in getting their produce to market, but at a tremendous cost to them. The countries of France and Germany years ago recognized the necessity of improving the highways of their respective nations, and the Governments of these countries freely gave large sums of money to aid the rural people in improving their highways, and for this reason the highways of France and Germany far exceed in importance and usefulness the highways of our Government, although we have the richest and most powerful Government upon the earth.

The country constitutes God's great reservoir where the strong, virile, fighting men and women of the world live, and from which we must draw. Their very lives represent a spirit of independence and against dependency. The country man and woman have always maintained high ideals of life; they have been sound in thought and prompt in performance; they know no cunning treachery or trickery, but to them life is a stern reality, and everything cold facts. They can be depended upon at all times to do their duty to their country, their family, and their God. This class of people represents the great conservative element of the Nation, not moved off their feet by every will-o'-the-wisp, but coolly and deliberately they calculate from cause to effect, and it is to them this country must look for its future endurance. The history of the world demonstrates that the rural people never destroyed a nation that ever fell, and no nation in the past ever fell until the country became depopulated and the cities overcrowded, and as a Nation we are driving at breakneck speed to the danger signal along this line when we behold countless millions of acres of valuable land in this country lying unsettled, and untilled to-day, and, on the other hand, see the abnormal growth of the great cities of the Nation. There are so many questions entering into this subject that I am at a loss to know where to stop, but I will conclude as I began, that this marks the beginning of a new dawn, the era of a righteous awakening, the hearkening of a wise appeal, the listening to the voice of justice, in granting this small mite in the way of an appropriation to a deserving class of people.

I hope the bill will become a law. [Applause.]

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TOWNSEND].

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to diverge from the interesting discussion of good roads to present some facts of vital importance relating to industrial conditions in the country at this time. I do this because Members have lately risen in this Chamber to give prominence to alleged facts designed to prove, if they were indeed facts, that industrial and commercial conditions are suffering from effects caused by the operation of the new tariff law and by other laws passed by this Democratic Congress.

Mr. Chairman, there is not in the United States an important manufacturing city which is a better index of industrial and manufacturing business conditions than is the city of Newark, N. J., which I have the honor in part to represent. Its manufactures are greatly varied, and few of them produce articles which do not appear upon some of the tariff schedules. If the new tariff were to result in a diminishing product of manufactures, as has so emphatically been asserted by gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, then in Newark, first of all the important manufacturing centers, that unfortunate result would have been observed.

Let me preface my relation as to that by stating some very significant facts concerning Newark's manufactures. In that city, Mr. Chairman, there is invested in manufactures more than $160,000,000; there are employed more than 60,000 skilled operatives, who are paid more than $45,000,000 annually in wages. The manufactures of Newark use raw material annually valued at about $125,000,000, and they turn out finished products valued in the markets at over $210,000,000. I have spoken of the variety, the great variety, of the products manufactured in Newark, and an idea of that is suggested by the fact that in that city there are about 2,000 establishments using power and employing more than 10 hands, the units, I believe, used by the Census Bureau in classifying an establishment as a manufacturing plant.

One day this week the local press of Newark chronicled an unusual occurrence, the assemblage at the city hall of a crowd of unemployed, demanding employment of the mayor. This created the impression in some places that Newark manufacturers were laying off operatives, and comment based upon that assumption appeared in some newspapers hostile to the Democratic tariff. That was not the cause, but the cause was not far to seek. Newark is a pleasant abiding place; it has beautiful parks; it supports many excellent places of amusement; its people are kindly and generous, and for these and other reasons unskilled laborers laid off from employment in neighborhood work, which can not be conducted in winter weather, gather in Newark, as they do for similar reasons in other large cities during the winters.

But the impression having gone out that this gathering of the unemployed resulted from the discharge of operatives in manufacturing establishments, a local newspaper, the Newark Evening News, conducted a thorough and painstaking investigation to determine the facts.

Before giving the results of that investigation, Mr. Chairman, it is proper that I should state that the paper I have mentioned, although independent in politics, does not invariably honor itself by expressions of esteem for the political principles which I advocate.

I now read some very informing extracts from the paper I have named:

A canvass of the largest industrial plants of the city discloses the fact that whatever destitution may exist or is threatened is confined principally to the unskilled-labor class. This same inquiry also disputes statements made by leaders of the unemployed regarding the number of hands laid off in different plants.

* * * * * * *

It was declared before Mayor Haussling by Edward Redler, as spokesman for several hundred men out of work, that at the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co. employees were being laid off 200 and 300 at a time; that at the Splitdorf plant, manufacturers of electrical appliances for the automobile trade, in High Street, 300 men were dismissed last week; and that no one could get a job at the Edison plant, in West Orange, if he were to get down on his knees and ask for it.

REDLER WAS MISINFORMED.

Investigation indicated that Redler was misinformed. In fact, the manufacturing plants of the city are working to their full capacity.

* * * * * * *

The superintendent of the Westinghouse plant said that business there was normal and that the season was not considered dull. About 2,000 employees are carried on the pay roll, he said, which means that the factory is working to its full capacity.

* * * * * * *

The business of the company is in no way affected by the tariff, and trade was said to be good.

At the Splitdorf plant it was declared that the full force of the factory—1,000 men—were being kept busy and that business was normal. It was positively denied that any 300 men were laid off there last week. Not more than three or four have been laid off at a time, the superintendent said, and the period of nonemployment in such cases was short.

For the Edison Phonograph Co., in West Orange, the superintendent stated yesterday that there were 3,600 hands employed there steadily, and that from 20 to 30 new hands were taken on every day. * * * Business is good, he said, although the company's product is a luxury. In the Edison storage-battery plant it was true, he said, that about 600 men were laid off a month ago during a dull season, but these hands are being taken back in large numbers and in another month they will all be back, it was said.

PLANTS IN FULL BLAST.

The leather trade in this city is being kept busy, according to reports from some of the leading manufacturers. While there may not be enough orders coming in to keep all the factories running up to their full capacity, none of the plants have laid off men, it was said, but have kept their full forces at work turning out leather which is stored away. There is every indication, it was said, that in a few weeks business will become so brisk that the trade will be overtaxed. It is to meet this anticipated demand that the manufacturers are storing their goods.

Johnston & Murphy, the shoe manufacturing concern, is working a full force full time, and it was declared at the factory that the other shoe manufacturers in this city and down East are experiencing a good season with brighter prospects for the future.

Weingarten Bros., corset manufacturers, are running on full time with a force of nearly 1,500 hands. Their sales for January were away ahead of those for the same month last year and they report that buyers from all parts of the country are placing big orders. Other concerns in the same line report business conditions to be good, too.

The hat business is reported to be good and no hands have been laid off in the big plants. Whitehead & Hoag, manufacturers of celluloid buttons and novelties, have between 750 and 800 employees on the pay roll, working full time, although this is the dull season. A year ago the force was much less.

This is the slow season also for the jewelry trade after the holiday months, but business is said to be normal for the time. Very few jewelers are out of work, although the time has been shortened in several places. In other plants that have no particularly dull season conditions are either reported up to the standard or better than usual.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SELDOMRIDGE].

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I would be indifferent to the needs and wishes of the district which I represent if I did not express my cordial support of this measure. I believe it will prove a powerful factor in developing the great agricultural sections of the country. It will not only stimulate growth of population, but it will also increase the development of farms and their production; it will also contribute greatly to the ease and comfort of rural life. The State which I have the honor in part to represent has within its confines a large area of public land which is still open to homestead and settlement. It is a State of magnificent distances, and it is necessary that the farmer should be brought into immediate and easy access to the markets for his products. I believe that this legislation will contribute very materially to the settlement of our public domain in the Western States, and that it will encourage the expenditure of State money in the development of roads.

The large and increasing use of the motor vehicle is doing much to focus attention upon the necessity for road development in all parts of the country. We have just begun to realize what an important factor the country road is in the distribution of our food supply and in the settlement of our farming areas. The time is past when we can expect American youth to embark in agricultural pursuits unless the comforts and conveniences of city life are in some measure realized. Well-built and properly cared for highways connecting cities, towns, and villages with the country population will do much to develop community interest. Not only will these provide the farmer with a larger variety of social life, relieving to some extent the monotony of farm employment, but it will give him that contact with friends and neighbors which is so necessary to stimulate thought and enterprise. The time is past when the farmer must live to himself. He should be thrown into constant fellowship with his fellow farmers; there should be a comparison of ideas and a stimulation of effort which can only grow out of association and intercourse. Given quick and easy means of communication, we will soon witness a noticeable development in agricultural wealth.

We rejoice as citizens in the splendid advance which our Agricultural Department has made during the past 25 years in the dissemination of information which means so much to the farmers. There is a widespread quickening of interest in all agricultural lines, and the farmer has learned that there is just as much brain as there is brawn to be employed in the proper conduct of his farm. This general distribution of agricultural information not only by the General Government but through the regular channels of the State agricultural colleges, while it has accomplished much of benefit to the farmer, yet vastly more good will be derived when this information can be practically demonstrated in its application. It is, therefore, quite essential that our agricultural population should be more and more thrown together for the interchange of ideas and for the consideration of questions directly affecting the output of the land and the economic welfare of our great farming population.

The good-roads movement is, therefore, a great economic necessity.

I confidently predict that no expenditure of money will yield so large a return to the Nation in practical benefit as the money which is being appropriated by this bill. The farmers of the Nation have been taxed for many years to deepen the harbors, to widen the channels, to construct fortifications, to build lighthouses, and to provide in many ways for the development and enlargement of the trade of our great manufacturing centers and our seaport cities. Is it not, therefore, necessary and timely that the Nation should now devote a portion of her great revenue to the building up of our internal highways, stimulating the productivity of the land, and bringing to our vacant farms and unsettled areas a population that will be permanent and contented? The life of the farmer is a strenuous one at best. His income is affected by causes largely beyond his control. Drought, hail, and flood may visit him and wipe out the fruit of the toil of many months. He may see his market congested and the price of his product forced below its natural level through manipulation of speculators and gamblers. Should not more thought and attention be given to his material needs, and should we not seek in every way to protect and foster his interests?

The construction and maintenance of good roads will not only develop and enlarge the postal facilities of the Government, but it will bring the farmer into closer contact with his markets, and thereby increase the income of his labor. If we can in any way reduce the time that is consumed by our farming population in going to and from markets over public roads, and thereby increase the number of working hours upon the farm, is it not fair to conclude that the product of the farm will show an appreciable increase?

I not only believe that this legislation will be of great benefit to our agricultural population, but it will also be of equal benefit to those living in the towns and cities.

It is only in recent years that many of the States have recognized the necessity for a more general treatment of the public-road problem by providing for the creation of State highway commissions and in the adoption of uniform systems of road extension and maintenance. This policy has required a larger outlay of public funds, and the people have willingly borne the increased amount of taxation for public roads, realizing the benefit to be derived therefrom. The time is past when the farmer should carry the larger share of this taxation, and it is now recognized that the burden should be equally distributed throughout the Commonwealth, and by this bill it is in some measure to be placed upon the Nation.

The farmer has not been the sole beneficiary of the good-roads policy. The cities have begun to reap the benefits of this movement. There is a widespread campaign throughout the entire country for better roads leading to and from the cities. To the extent that these roads are improved and the conveniences of travel developed, to that extent will there be a freer movement of local commerce. The better provision we make for quick and easy communication between the farm and the city, to that extent have we solved some of the food-supply problems which are now of great concern to those who live and labor in our cities.

Not only is the problem of city life affected by the character and condition of roads leading directly into the city, but it is also affected by the character and condition of roads which are far removed from the city and which only connect the country districts with the railroad shipping points. These roads, while they bear no direct relationship to the city and have no connection therewith, yet they have a vital relation upon the quantity and quality of the city food supply. This question is not a local question in any sense; it is national and general. It is in every way worthy of the attention of Congress.

So far I have considered this question from an economic viewpoint. I now desire to briefly refer to another phase of the good-roads movement, which I think is equally important. It is too early for us to properly value the benefit of the good-roads movement in its effect upon the health of those who live in our cities and who have the means to enjoy open air traveling over public highways. While it is true that this pleasure is given to only a limited number of our population on account of the expense involved, yet the motor car has taken many thousands out of the confinement and narrowness of city life to enjoy the freshness and invigoration which comes from out-of-door activity. It has also contributed to the growth and enlargement of suburban sections and has added much value to property adjacent to the large cities.

This movement has not run its course; it will grow with each passing year. Improved methods of road construction will be ascertained, and the time is not far distant when there will be great overland highways extending north and south, east and west.

The State of Colorado has been one of the first to realize the benefits that follow the construction of good roads. We have so much to give the tourist in the way of scenery of mountain, valley, and plain that we are beginning to appreciate the great asset which this scenery is to us. Our State highway commission is engaged in the development of a comprehensive scheme of road extension and construction. We offer to the tourist the most attractive and seductive journeys over our snow-clad summits and through our deep winding valleys and tortuous canyons. I covet for the membership of this body no greater pleasure than to afford them a journey over the plains and mountain roads of our Commonwealth.

In speaking as I have concerning our Colorado roads I do not desire to make any envious distinction in our behalf. I am sure that other Western States have much to offer the tourist and sight-seer along the line of well-constructed and properly maintained highways.

During the year 1913 the State of Colorado appropriated $584,200 from the State road fund, to be expended among the various counties of the State as those counties expressed a willingness to participate in this fund by appropriating from their own treasuries. In addition to the amount above named the counties appropriated the sum of $437,100. The State is divided into five districts, so that during the past year there was an apportionment made of $1,021,300. Of the apportionment thus made there was expended during the year the sum of $791,000, divided as follows, according to the report of the State highway commission, which I append:

Work was in progress on 1,600 miles of State roads in grading and ditching, at a cost of about $350 per mile	$560,000
There has been 80 bridges constructed of all sizes, from 15-foot slab up to a 540-foot bridge, at an average cost of $1,800 each	144,000
There has been 900 culverts of all kinds placed, at an average cost of $30 each	27,000
There has been about 50 miles of State roads surfaced with gravel, shale, or sand clay, at a total cost of about	60,000
Making a total expenditure for the season of	791,000

There is a balance of $136,799.92 remaining to the credit of various counties, and of this approximately $36,000 will be used before the spring work opens in 1914, leaving about $100,000 of State funds for work which some counties were unable to complete this season.

This gives $447,400.08 of the State fund as expended this season up to November 30, 1913, and about three-fourths as much of the county funds, making a total expenditure of about $791,000 this season on the State-road system.

The cost of administration of this fund was a little less than 3 per cent.

In order that some idea may be had as to the general character of work performed under the direction and supervision of our State highway commission, I attach the following extract from its report:

During the past season work has been in progress on the main passes, as follows:

On Berthoud Pass, in Grand and Clear Creek Counties, the road was improved.

On Tennessee Pass the road in Lake County is in splendid shape, and work is in progress on the Eagle County side.

On Independence Pass work has been in progress in Pitkin County, and this road in Pitkin County will be completed during this coming season.

On Monarch Pass work has been in progress in both Chaffee and Gunnison Counties.

The Poncha Pass Road is now open for travel and is in very good condition. This pass has had considerable work done on it this year in Chaffee and Saguache Counties.

Cochetopa Pass is practically opened in Saguache County, and will be completed from Gunnison by the end of this coming season.

Work has been in progress on the divide between Creede and Lake City, in both Mineral and Hinsdale Counties.

On Elwood Pass the road has been completed within 2 miles of the top on the east slope, and to the foot of the hill on the west fork on the western slope.

Work was in progress all season on the road from Silverton to Ouray, and also on the Durango Road, and a good part of the most difficult construction was completed.

La Veta Pass Road has been improved in both Huerfano and Costilla Counties.

On the north and south highway work was in progress in Larimer, Adams, Arapahoe, Weld, Douglas, El Paso, Pueblo, Huerfano, and Las Animas Counties, in fact, all along the line.

On the Platte Valley river road work was in progress in every county—Sedgwick, Logan, Morgan, Adams, Weld, and along the branches through Phillips, Washington, and Yuma.

On the Rainbow Route good progress was made on the piece of road between Cotopaxi and Parkdale, and the road between Gunnison and Montrose was opened over the Blue Mesa. Considerable work was done on the Black Mesa Road by Delta, Montrose, and Gunnison Counties.

Every county in the State, in fact, without a single exception, was busy with road improvement during the season, and an immense improvement is shown in the work.

Besides the work of preparing plans and specifications for the bridges, grading, and surfacing, and other work, surveys, maps, and profiles have been examined and filed; monthly statements of expenditures from every county in the State have been received, checked, and vouchers for the proper amounts issued to the State auditor.

Bulletin No. 3 has been written up and issued to the various counties.

General letters have been sent to the counties concerning camping grounds, and the proper methods of keeping account of expenditures on road work and proceedings of the Road Builders' convention at Pueblo have been writen up and will soon be issued in proper form.

In addition to the foregoing work the forestry officials have expended on roads in this State approximately $20,000 of a special appropriation made by the last Congress. This work has been done in Saguache, Rio Grande, Clear Creek, Lake, Pitkin, Grand, and La Plata Counties. The forestry officials have acted in full accord and harmony with this department in all their work, and the State can receive additional assistance during this coming season from this same source.

The total mileage of all roads in the State of Colorado is 30,571.

Not only has the State recognized the value of good roads through legislation enacted and the appropriation of State funds, but the movement is being supported in our Commonwealth by the enthusiastic indorsement of civic and commercial organizations. Every community of any size has its board of trade and chamber of commerce in which the good-roads matter is most frequently and profitably considered. There has been a generous spirit of cooperation in all sections of the State, and there is every promise that, with the Federal aid afforded through this bill, that the roads of the State will be greatly increased in number and improved in maintenance. I desire to quote briefly from the issue of The Motor Age, published in Chicago, of November 14 last, concerning the attractions of a motor tour through the mountain regions of Colorado:

Volumes have been written on the scenic attractions of Colorado, but almost nothing said about these wonders in relation to the motor tourist. Thousands of tourists have seen Colorado by train and, wonderful as some of these trips are, they can not be compared with what may be seen from the motor car. Of course, this statement will hold true in almost any section where it is possible for a car to go, but none the less the difference in Colorado is so marked that anyone who has had the opportunity of seeing the scenic wonders of that State from both viewpoints will agree that the train offers nothing more than a fleeting glimpse.

The number of canyons, passes, gorges, roads, etc., that are open to motor travel are almost unlimited, and the wonderful thing is that every one has some distinct feature that makes it almost entirely different from all others.

SURPASS THE ALPS.

Each day's journey will bring fresh and thrilling vistas. Nowhere, not even in the Alps, can the motorist view from his car canyons to compare with those of the Arkansas, the Gunnison, or the Grand, nor can he view snow-capped peaks to equal those of the Saguache or Sangre de Cristo Ranges. No other State has so much to offer the tourist in variety of scenery as has Colorado.

To those who have never seen the Rockies it is impossible to picture, even with the best photographs, the mountain landscape of the rocks with their tremendous heights and depths. To every true American the motto "See America first" should call to him above all else, and the car owner has an opportunity to see America which far surpasses every other means for tourist travel. There is something so big about these mountains of enormous heights with their snow caps that no one with red blood in his veins can see them and not feel the uplifting, inspiring influence. It has been truly said, once see the Rockies in all their grandeur and you will always feel them drawing you back.

Some people who have the best interests not only of Colorado, but all North America at heart wonder why it is that so many tourists flock abroad each summer, more and more of them in recent years making a tour abroad in their machines. The simple answer is accessibility and accommodations well advertised. These two features abroad have not only been well taken care of and advertised, but made an asset in every possible way. The tourist going through France or Switzerland finds not only wonderful road conditions and accommodations at frequent intervals, but that the people are catering to the tourist.

TOURING FACILITIES UNKNOWN.

If careful inquiry is made into the subject it will be found that these two reasons are the most important in drawing tourists abroad, whereas most people believe that the real primary reason is scenic attractions. Attractive scenery is what might be called the talking point to get people into any section. But this can not be used as an argument for Americans going abroad, as America has some of the most attractive and the greatest variety of scenery in the world. If this condition were admitted, then why the continued travel abroad? Simply because, as far as the motorist goes, the movement for good roads has made real progress, particularly in the Rocky Mountain States, only during the last 18 months.

Two or three years ago it would have been something of a stunt to drive an automobile from Denver to Grand Junction, Colo.; to-day there are two or three routes open to the tourist, and by next summer the needed improvement along these in certain sections will put them on a par with other good roads in America.

SURFACED WITH GRANITE.

Although not macadam, a considerable part of them are surfaced with decomposed granite or a hard shale clay, either one of which withstands wet weather remarkably well. Most of the cliff roads, i. e., roads literally cut out of the mountain side and almost overhanging a river anywhere from 25 to 2,000 feet below, either have turnouts at very frequent intervals or are made sufficiently wide to allow passing at any point.

There are a great many such roads in the State. Although they require careful driving due to their winding nature, which will not allow the driver to see very far ahead, and also on account of their short, steep grades, they can all be made by an ordinary car. No tourist who thoroughly enjoys mountain scenery will care to go fast because the view is changing every second. Some of the most wonderful and picturesque views of snowcaps are to be had while driving on a narrow gorge road and the view will suddenly open up at a turn of the road at most surprising times; one truly wants four pairs of eyes.

ROADS GENERALLY FINE.

Too much can not be said about the road conditions in Colorado as compared with other sections open to motor travel. Although not boulevards like some of the newly constructed roads in the East, the number of miles that are affected by wet weather is remarkably small. Furthermore, the rainfall in Colorado is almost a minimum, particularly during the touring months. On only two days of our whole trip did we go over roads that would have been anywhere near impassable in wet weather, and both of these sections will be materially improved for the summer of 1913. Everyone of our party on completing the trip unequivocally stated that he would rather make the trip from either Denver, Colorado Springs, or Pueblo for Grand Junction than travel over almost any other equal distance in the United States.

* * * * * * *

Another thing of vast importance to Colorado as a tourists' State is the climate. First, there is very little rain; this is particularly true between April and December. The number of clear, sunshiny days is almost the maximum. The atmosphere is wonderfully clear and, as nearly every one knows, the distances one can see are understood clearly only by those who have actually visited in the Rockies. Most of the nights in the hottest weather are cool, and way into late October the days are warm enough, except in the very highest altitudes, to travel in a machine without an overcoat. This is no doubt due to the dryness of the air.

TENNESSEE PASS.

In crossing the continental divide between Leadville and Glenwood Springs the motor tourist crosses from the Atlantic to the Pacific slope over Tennessee Pass, one of the lowest and most accessible roads over the Rockies, with an altitude of 10,276 feet. Although very heavy snowfalls may take place and block the pass to travel as early as September, this same snow very seldom stays more than a day or two until late October or November. Although the crossing here is at an altitude of nearly 2 miles, approaching the pass from Leadville one hardly notices the climb, as it is a gradual ascent of about 2,200 feet from Buena Vista. Members of the recent pathfinding trip who went through the pass found it to be one of the most interesting features of their most enjoyable trip through Colorado. The rugged scenery appealed to them strongly, while the roads were excellent.

The American tourist of to-day is not aware of the scenic fascinations of the great mountain sections of the West; he is not aware of the exhilaration that comes from weeks spent in the foothills of the Rockies, as well as crossing the main ranges through the various passes; he is ignorant of the boundless wealth of the great plateau land between the Rockies and the coast ranges, and he has not grasped the stimulating benefits that come from weeks of out-of-door life in this the great tourists' playground of the American continent.

Colorado has within her borders more of mountain scenery than all of Europe can boast of. The motorist refrains from touring in Colorado, because he considers the roads impossible and is not familiar with the hotel accommodations. The tourist who has spent weeks and traveled from 1,500 to 2,000 miles through the scenic centers of Colorado is amazed at finding the roads through nearly all of the mountain passes better than the roads of the Adirondacks or the White Mountains. This is true. The State of Colorado has, through its convict-labor system, accomplished wonders in road construction, building roads that are being as scientifically constructed as many of the famed highways through Switzerland; in fact, Colorado is aiming at equaling, if not surpassing, Switzerland by engineering road plans whereby it will be possible to travel through the heart of the Rockies and not encounter grades of over 6 per cent.

To-day it is possible for a tourist driving himself, and with a party of four, to spend three weeks in the heart of the Rockies; to travel during this period 1,500 miles, and to get more vistas of mountain scenery, fathomless canyons, and other formations consequent upon mountain ranges than he could obtain in a similar period in the Alpine sections of Europe.

The trouble with the American tourist to-day is that he does not know his own country; he does not know the mystic beauties it affords the motorist who seeks the far-away fields of western grandeur. Unfortunately, those States that hold in their lap the unexcelled grandeurs of the continent have not advertised these beauties as they should have. They have been content to let American tourists spend their tens of millions annually with the hotels and inns of Europe. To-day they are not awakened to the possibilities of turning the tide of touring from our big cities westward.

The roads are there, the scenery is there, the hotels, to an extent, are there; the directions for the tourist to follow are there; the signboards are more prolific than in New England. But the tourists are wanting. It remains for the citizens of Colorado, for the citizens of Arizona, for the citizens of Montana, for the citizens of Utah, and for the citizens of California and the coast States to unite and proclaim to the American tourist what they have to offer. Without this it is unnatural to expect that the tide of touring will turn to the West as it should.

"See America first" is the watchword that all of these Western States should keep constantly before them. Their messages must be carried to the cities of the Central West and of the Allegheny slopes. One announcement will not serve to change the course of travel; two will not suffice; a hundred may fail to accomplish the desired results. One thing is certain, namely, that if the great army of American tourists was aware of the phenomenal scenery of the sections referred to, and aware of the relatively good condition of the roads to-day, and was aware of the reasonable hotel accommodations afforded that there would be millions spent in the West Central and Mountain States next year which will, unless something is done, be spent in the various countries in Europe.

The entire country is not aware of the phenomenal strides that have been made in road building in the mountain sections of Colorado within the last few years. This road enterprise has not been confined solely to highways from city to city, selecting the shortest route; rather scenic roads have been engineered and built especially for the mountain panoramas which they afford. Through the deepest canyons the motorists' narrow stone road is now an accompaniment of the ever-present mountain river or creek and the pioneering railroad track. Practically all of the more important passes have improved roadways. It is true that these are narrow, but they are adequate. The owner-motorist, who is accustomed to driving his car over the varied roads of the country, will not have any difficulty in a two weeks' mountain trip. At times he will skirt apparently fathomless canyons, but there is no immediate danger. At other times he will be far above the timber line, but the roadway is as safe as through the cornfields of Illinois. In a two weeks' trip, if he has his car in rational condition, it will not be necessary to have to be towed in a single instance. He will find comfortable hotels and inns within reach nearly every day. He will have no difficulty in purchasing gasoline. He will have no difficulty in following routes from place to place; in fact, he will find touring in many of the most beautiful sections of the Rocky Mountains as easy as in the Central States and some parts of New England.

Secretary Lane deserves great credit for having developed the idea of advertising the attractions of American scenery to European tourists. We freely criticize the thousands of Americans who annually cross the Atlantic in order to enjoy the scenery of Europe. There is no reason why a stream of European travel should not be diverted to America to witness the great natural wonders that we have to offer the world. We can not estimate the millions of American money that annually finds its abiding place in European pockets. Is it not time that we should endeavor to secure for ourselves a return of European capital in the way of tourist travel to our shores? The progress in good roads throughout our country, especially in our scenic regions, will do much to turn this stream of European wealth in our direction.

I can not close my remarks without adverting to the employment of convict labor on the public roads in Colorado. In my opinion this employment has proved to be a most beneficent humanitarian agency. The prisoners, instead of being confined within narrow cells or limited to the exercise only possible within the grim walls of the prison house, are permitted to breathe the pure mountain air and to secure for themselves in some way a modified sense of freedom. Is it any wonder that those who are undergoing prison sentence strive, through observance of certain rules, to secure this privilege for out-of-door work and exercise?

Our State deals with its prisoners employed upon the roads in a way which is calculated to reform them and make them better members of society. They do not carry with them the traditional ball and chain—the badge of servitude and dishonor—nor are they compelled to wear the repulsive striped clothing. To a great extent guard surveillance is withdrawn and these men are put upon their honor. Space and time will not permit me to cite the success of this policy; sufficient to say that the confidence reposed in these men has only been abused in a very few instances. The counties of our State are vieing with each other in their efforts to secure convict labor for their public roads. Under the Colorado system the convict is allowed 10 days off his sentence for each month of labor on the roads. This is in addition to the usual reduction for good behavior. It would be almost impossible to build many of our mountain roads if we were obliged to construct them by public taxation. Colorado is proud of the record which has been achieved in this direction under the direction of the warden of our penitentiary, Mr. Thomas J. Tynan, whose reputation as a leader in this work has extended far beyond the bounds of our Commonwealth. Let me quote what Mr. Tynan says in relation to this work:

The benefits in this or any other State from a broad and scientific system of convict road building can scarcely be estimated. Basing our figures on actual experience we are confident that we can construct in the next 10 years more than 5,000 miles of the very finest roadways for less than $300,000, and this without adding anything whatever to the burden of the taxpayers.

During the period of 10 years the internal-revenue fund of Colorado should amount to $2,000,000. After deducting $500,000 for road construction, the remaining amount should be wisely expended in bridge building, road repairing, and for similar uses. Add to this the financial assistance from the different counties and it would enable us to construct not less than 10,000 miles. It can be done in Colorado. Why should not the same conditions apply to other States under more favorable conditions, where the roads are naturally better and where cost of construction would not necessarily be so high as in our mountainous sections.

To illustrate better the great saving to the taxpayers on this class of work and its possibilities, let me quote a few figures from one of our road camps. The number of days employed was 24¾. During one month we worked 35 men on the road, not including the camp help. Each of these 35 men rendered to the State labor equivalent in value to $2 and $3 a day. The labor for each man cost the State exactly 23 cents per day. Had this number of men been employed at the regular standard of wages of, say, $2 per day per man, the cost of wages alone would have been $1,632.50. Each day's work thus represented a net saving of at least $1.75 per man.

The total cost of all the work for the month, including salaries, care of stock, feed for teams, and cost of equipment, was $515.15, or 47¾ cents per day per man. When these figures are considered no one can doubt for a moment the economy of building roads with convict labor. The roads are carefully and thoroughly inspected by competent engineers, who testify to the completeness and high character of the work. What is the incentive for the men to create such great work? is a question often asked Coloradoans. It is just this: The man who is allowed to leave the prison for the road camp has practically seen the last of prison life if he conducts himself properly. His food is better, his clothing is better, his self-respect is preserved, and he is taught self-reliance and sustained application. He earns an additional 10 days a month during the time he works, which very materially reduces his sentence. Eliminating the policy of armed guards, the men have been placed under skilled and competent overseers and guarded only by their word of honor not to run away. They remain faithful and loyal to their pledges. The success of such an honor system was instantaneous; the plan has worked out better than its originators expected. During the last three years we have had more than 1,000 individual prisoners in the convict camps. These men, without guards, some 300 miles away from the prison, have created a national reputation for loyalty. Less than 1 per cent have violated their pledges and made successful escape. Communities no longer fear to have our convict camps established near them. We have made manhood as well as money by this healthy, hearty outdoor labor. We have built the prisoners up both physically and morally. Men discharged from our road camps do not have the prison pallor, the physical weakness, and the hesitation and hangdog appearance of the typical discharged convict. They are bronzed, sturdy, healthy, efficient laborers and are in demand as such. About 80 per cent of those we have sent out upon the completion of their sentence have made good; the other 20 per cent have mostly found their way back into prison elsewhere.

In estimating with reference to the financial element in convict road building, Warden Tynan makes the following statement in his annual report for the year ending November 30, 1912:

Our largest item of labor performed by the convicts was, of course, the road work. The prisoners have been employed in the construction of roads in Mesa, Fremont, Larimer, Weld, Boulder, Jefferson, El Paso, and Pueblo Counties. They have built 157 miles of good roadway, and a great deal of this has been blasted out of solid rock, that in Mesa County being the most difficult and heavy work ever attempted by our men.

Owing to the fact that it was impossible to get from the various counties the cost of material—such as cement, lumber, steel, corrugated culverts, powder, tools, and supplies, other than actual labor, used in road and bridge building—we are enabled to give you only the labor cost to these different counties for the work of the men. This work has been done at an average cost to the different counties of 32 cents per day per man, and, as this cost includes Sundays and holidays, the cost of the labor of these men to the counties for the 2 years, or 731 days, would be $36,725.44. We have worked 21 State teams, and the feed for these teams cost the counties $20 per month per team, which would amount to $10,080, making a total cost to the counties for labor of $46,805.44. The average labor cost for the 157 miles was $298.12 per mile.

It is hard to estimate the immense value of these roads, for the reason that the work in Mesa County alone would have cost, with free labor, not less than $25,000 per mile, as the rock in places had to be blasted for 75 feet in order to get a proper roadbed. In this work it was necessary to drill holes 25 feet deep and to drill three depths before the roadbed was reached. So you can readily see the magnitude of this work. The work in Ute Pass, in El Paso County, was done through solid rock for 6 miles, all blasting.

The work in Salt Canyon and Parkdale Hill, in Fremont County, and Pingree Hill, Cherokee Hill, and Thompson Canyon, in Larimer County, contained a great deal of blasting. This necessarily would have been very expensive work had it been done with free labor, and the counties would have been forced to pay big salaries for drillers, blasters, powder men, masons, and cement workers. Not counting what the contractor's profits might be, and not including any skilled labor except blacksmiths, cement workers, and masons, and estimating the cost of free labor at $2 per day, by eliminating Sundays and holidays we may count 132 men working 610 days at $2 per day, which would give us a labor value of $161,040. We have worked an average of 20 masons and cement workers, which would have cost the counties $5 per day, and would have amounted to $61,000. We have averaged five blacksmiths, whose labor is estimated at $4 per day, and this would have amounted to $12,220. Estimating the value of 21 teams, at $2.50 per day per team, for 610 days, it would amount to $32,025. At a low figure the value of the labor of these men and teams would be worth to the counties $266,285. Add to this a depreciation of State equipment, $2,000, and the interest on State equipment, $2,000, and you can see that this labor has been worth to the different counties $270,285. The difference between what the free labor alone would have cost the public—namely, $270,285—and what the labor of our men actually cost them shows a labor profit of $223,479.56. However, this labor did not compete with the free labor of the State, for the reason that the counties could not otherwise have afforded to do this work.

Surely the employment of convict labor on the public roads in Colorado is no longer an experiment, but has become a settled policy. It has demonstrated its effectiveness in the construction of many miles of road that could not have been built otherwise. It has solved the problem of prison labor; it has relieved the burden of taxation and it has contributed much to the health and physical vigor of our prison population.

I believe that the moral effect upon the convict of this out-of-door labor has been most salutary. It is difficult to secure statistics that will in any way reveal the after life of those who have been thus employed. I am confident, however, that many a man has faced the world with more courage and hope after having worked on this road construction than he would have under the ordinary conditions of prison confinement. It will possibly be found that the provisions of the bill under consideration are in many respects unsatisfactory when they are put into practical operation, but the proposition underlying the bill is beneficent and worthy of support. It recognizes the responsibility of the General Government to bear in some measure the expense of the construction of our post roads. This attitude of the Government will be reflected in all sections of the country, and I predict that intelligent and comprehensive attention will be devoted to this question as never before.

It is a matter of congratulation that this question is one concerning which there can be no partisan differences. It is one which appeals to the good judgment and support of citizens everywhere. It is not sectional but national. It will contribute largely to the prosperity and welfare of our entire country.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I have been such an earnest advocate of good roads and have been so earnest in the promotion of legislation looking toward the Federal aid to good roads, and have expressed so fully my views on the subject to the committee on good roads, that I feel a large measure of freedom in expressing my views on this particular bill. I feel that there is no possibility of anyone at home or in this House mistaking my criticism of this bill for a lack of individual interest in good roads.

I am not in favor of the principle on which this bill is drawn. It does not carry out the pledge of the Democratic platform, which is that the Federal Government shall aid the States in the construction of post roads, nor does it carry out the views of the Secretary of Agriculture, that the smallest unit with which the Nation should deal should be the State. If the Government wants to carry out a plan for improving its post roads, its constitutional power is ample; but this bill is not confined to post roads, nor does it relate to post roads except incidentally. Its title refers to post roads, and the money is distributed one-half on the basis of the mileage of post roads, but there is no provision in the bill which restricts the improvement to post roads, nor is the operation of the bill put under the charge of the Post Office Department. On the other hand, it is not purely market-road plan, as advocated by the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture advocated that the smallest unit with which we should deal must be the State, which should have ample machinery in the form of a State highway department, with full legal powers over the construction, improvement, and maintenance of roads. This bill is neither a post-road plan nor a market-road plan. In other words, in my judgment, it is neither fish, fowl, nor good red herring. I have two substantial objections to the theory of the bill. One is that it provides the means by which the Federal authorities can overlap constituted powers of the State government and deal directly with the several subdivisions of the State. It says in the very opening paragraph that the Secretary of Agriculture on behalf of the United States may aid the States and the civil subdivisions thereof.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, in that connection I would like to ask the gentleman if the bill also provides the manner in which it may do that?

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman knows what his bill provides. I was just about to come to that. In section 3 it says that the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cooperate with the officers of the several States having lawful authority in that behalf in the construction of roads. That includes the township trustee, certainly, because he has lawful authority in that behalf in the construction of roads.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is he an officer of the State?

Mr. BORLAND. Certainly he is an officer of the State under the constitution of the State of Missouri, and it has been so held. Every county official is an officer of the State. On page 7 of the bill it provides that the payments under this road-rental section shall be made to "such officers of the State" as the governor shall designate to be entitled to receive the same, which might be the county court in our State, or the township trustee or the county commissioner in some States, or a road overseer, or any one of a number of other local officials.

I do not see how any man who believes in State rights can divorce State rights from State powers and State duties. I do not believe in a form of Federal legislation which overleaps the constituted authority of the State and deals directly with any lesser political subdivision as a political subdivision. But if the Federal Government chose to exercise its paramount constitutional power to go in there and build the road as a post road, or a military road, or even, under the late decisions of the Supreme Court, as an interstate-traffic road, it would have ample power to do it.

So much for the violation of State rights. But the main objection I have to this bill is embraced in the road-rental feature. In section 3 and section 4 it purports to give an option, which the governor of the State may exercise, as to the form which the Federal aid may take. That option is left, not to the Federal Government but to the governor of the State, on the face of the bill. Section 3 provides that the governor, in conjunction with the Federal authorities, may by agreement make a special law applying to his State for the construction and maintenance of roads. If the governor does not do that—and, in my judgment, the chances are a thousand to one that he will not be able to make a satisfactory agreement—then he has the other option of having the money paid to his State anyway, under the road-rental proposition. I think the practical effect of that will be that the option will be nugatory, and it will be a road-rental proposition in the last analysis unless the Federal Government were clothed with the power to exercise the option, and not the State.

Now, it says roads shall be paid for at the rate of $60 a mile for macadam roads, $30 for shell and gravel roads, and $15 a mile for dirt roads. That is to be paid not on the basis of the roads as needed for post roads or for any other purpose, not on the basis of what the Secretary of Agriculture or the Postmaster General thinks is needed as a road, but on the basis of what happens to exist as an improved road or to be brought into existence as an improved road by the local authorities.

Why are we having any road legislation at all from a national standpoint? If the local authorities had ample power and means and machinery to carry out a road program, why would they be asking for Federal aid? Is it a little $15 or $20 or $60 a mile that is beyond the power of the State taxing power, and that is the only thing they need? Is that all? Can we, with $15 a mile added to the taxing power of the State, work miracles? I do not think so.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Does the gentleman object to giving the States this election that the bill affords?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not think that election is any more than a nominal election.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Does not the bill expressly provide that the governor shall have that right of election?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; and if the gentleman had followed my remarks closely he would know that I tried to show why it was likely he would not exercise it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I did follow it closely, and that is why I wanted to challenge it. It says that he shall provide the election in conformity with the laws of the State, and it gives the State the right to have this election made.

Mr. BORLAND. I understand that was put in there for the benefit of the States that do not have State highway commissions and perhaps do not want to have them, and under those circumstances they would have the option, under section 3, of asking for the appropriation under another form. The State is supposed to be fined 10 per cent for not having a State highway commission. As a matter of fact, they will not be fined 10 per cent, for the bill states they can have a highway commission without saying what the powers will be. Any State can have a highway commission, if it is desired, in order to save a reduction of 10 per cent in the road fund. So I do not think there would be any question but that a majority of the elections, or possibly all the elections, would occur as in section 4.

I want to show you why I am opposed to the road-rental proposition as a solution of the road problem; and that, in my judgment, is the crux of the situation. If the road-rental proposition would solve this demand for improved highways in this country, I say that there would be no good-road question in Congress, for it is so trifling in amount and so easy of application in the last analysis that it adds to the plenary taxing powers of the State but a little more money in the form of a Federal distribution. That is said to be an encouragement to the State. Well, of course, it is an encouragement to the localities of the State that have already an ample taxing power, and it is not an encouragement to the localities that may need the roads worse and where the Post Office Department may need the roads worse but have not the taxing power.

Take, for illustration, my own county of Jackson, in Missouri, which comprises the fifth congressional district of that State. That county has a city of nearly 300,000 people. It has ample taxing power, and as the result it has 300 miles of improved rock roads. It does not need the Government aid, although that district, I will say, will be entitled to more road-rental money than any other district in the State of Missouri. But we already spend over half a million dollars a year in that country in the maintenance and building of roads, and the $10,000 we would get by this bill would not be an encouragement for the construction of 1 mile of road in Jackson County.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. The gentleman is familiar with this subject and has given it great thought and consideration, and I would like to ask him if he considers that under the provisions of this bill a State is compelled to proportionately distribute the money received from the Federal Government?

Mr. BORLAND. I am going to reach that. I am glad the gentleman called my attention to it.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. BORLAND. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER. Speaking of the country roads in Jackson County and elsewhere in Missouri, I will ask the gentleman whether most of that work was not done as the result of and from the proceeds of money obtained from saloon licenses?

Mr BORLAND. Yes; from the dram-shop fund, raised in the county, including the incorporated cities. I may say that all these funds raised by taxation are in a certain sense a tax on the people. In any case the taxing power there is ample.

Now, there are other counties in Missouri where the taxing power is not ample, and where the road problems are increasingly great. In other words, in most of the sections of Missouri—and I think it is true in other States where the road problem is the most serious and where the need for road improvement is the greatest from the market standpoint and from the postal standpoint—the local taxing power and machinery are at the very minimum. In the localities in Missouri where the taxing power is great, and where the road problem has to a large extent already been solved, they have there a high-class road system, and that would take down a fair distribution of the money coming to Missouri.

Now, money appropriated to the needs of the roads is one thing, but if the money is appropriated in accordance with the accidental character of existing roads, it is an entirely different thing. Yet that is the theory upon which this bill is drawn. We do not go out and find where the roads are that need improvement for the benefit of the States and for the benefit of the Nation at large, but we are asked to find out where the roads, by the accidental accumulation of taxing wealth, have been already improved, and the minute they are improved they come under the highest class and demand the highest class of rental. That is the fault of the bill from a scientific standpoint.

Another great defect in the bill is that it gives the local authority no use whatever of the accumulated scientific knowledge and investigation as to the construction of roads, as to the necessary drainage of roads, as to the grades at which roads ought to be built, as to the maintenance of roads in an economical manner, and as to any of this information that is collected by the Federal Government in the Office of Public Roads. The road boss is denied all that. He has never had it, and he does not have it in his reach. He is asked, unaided by any scientific knowledge of road building, to bring his road up to the point where he can get some of this Federal money.

These are the vices from an economic standpoint. But the vice from the political standpoint is a more serious defect. What does this mean when you go home to the people and brag to them that you have compelled the Government to pay rental for the roads in your district? I might brag to my people that I have brought $10,000 or $15,000 of Federal money to my district. Another man might say: "Oh, BORLAND did not do so much. If you send me, I will bring $25,000 to be expended here as rental for the use of these roads." I might say: "I, too, will bring $25,000." But whichever one of us got here, we would find ourselves shoulder to shoulder with a large number of other men who have made similar pledges to increase the amount of road money. We would have to join together and get each of us the $25,000 that had been promised. It is the biggest log-rolling proposition that was ever passed. There is no end to its possibilities as a machine-politics system.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If that were to be done, does the gentleman think it would subtract anything from the possibilities of building a road, for which the gentleman himself has introduced a bill, from New York to San Francisco? Would our so-called log rolling in any manner interfere with the securing of funds to build that joy-riding road from New York to San Francisco?

Mr. BORLAND. I should think, sir, leaving out the epithet as to joy-riders—and it falls perfectly harmless upon me—that this would be the greatest blow to the good-roads movement that could be attempted.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. What is the "good-roads movement"?

Mr. BORLAND. Because in less than five years' time it would involve Congress in a scandal as to the expenditure of that road fund. We would have expended from $100,000,000 to $150,000,000, and the people would begin to say, "Where is that $150,000,000 that you have pretended to put in the roads?"

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Does not the gentleman think that the States would wisely expend one-half of the amount paid by the Federal Government? Does the gentleman think that the States would expend that money foolishly?

Mr. BORLAND. I am not saying that.

Mr. HOWARD. Does not the gentleman think that in his State and in my State the money would be beneficially expended?

Mr. BORLAND. If the States had solved the road problems for themselves, this bill would not be here. There is no doubt in the world about that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. BORLAND. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the gentleman think the scheme provided in this bill is infinitely better than for the National Government to build a road from one ocean to the other, as has been suggested here, for the benefit only of those who live near it?

Mr. BORLAND. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. These roads go through all the country, do they not?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Every State in the Union is represented here.

Mr. BORLAND. I will say to the gentleman a little later, if I have time left from these inquiries, what my views are as expressed before the Roads Committee.

I want to call your attention directly to what I believe to be the political vice of this distribution of road money in the form of road rental. I do not think there is any limit to it. I do not think it is directly connected with the improvement of roads or with the solution of the road problem. I think it perpetuates an element of waste and extravagance in the road problem that is already unavoidably present in that class of legislation.

One of the greatest enthusiasts about roads and one of the greatest road experts in this country is Gov. Hodges, the present Democratic governor of the State of Kansas. When he was in the Legislature of Kansas he was the good-roads man in that State, and he ran for governor on a good-roads platform. He published some statistics in which he shows that 80 per cent of the money now paid by the taxpayers for good roads never went on the roads at all, but was lost in one way or another in the process of administration. He showed that every time you appropriated a dollar under your existing system of isolated local control you discounted your dollar 80 cents the minute you passed your appropriation bill; and, in my opinion, that condition of affairs will be aggravated and perpetuated by this bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the gentleman yield for a question in that connection?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I yield to the gentleman. I may have to ask for more time.

Mr. SAUNDERS. If there is any merit whatever in these statements of Gov. Hodges, do you not realize that the system under which these funds will be administered will correct that situation, because this fund is to be administered jointly by the road department of the Department of Agriculture and the road commissions of the States? Does our friend think when those two great departments—one representing the State and the other the Federal Government—are administering this fund in order to secure the highest results in the way of improved roads, they will waste it and squander it and bring about scandals?

Mr. BORLAND. My dear sir, I know no more reason why these scandals should be avoided in the future than they have been in the past, because they are inherent in the system itself, and this bill is drawn upon the idea of continuing and perpetuating the system which, in my judgment, has produced the present road problem of the United States. We have had isolated local control of roads for 150 years, and that has resulted in the demand for national legislation. I interpret the demand to mean that we must find a more scientific way of constructing good roads than the present existing system. This proposes simply to add a little more money to the money that has been spent by the present road bosses, and is not a solution of the problem.

Mr. SAUNDERS. If the gentleman will allow me to ask one more question, I will not interrupt further.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. I will ask the gentleman to secure more time for me.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Let us take class C:

Class C shall embrace roads upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with adequate drainage and ample side ditches, with a roadway constructed so as to quickly shed water into the side ditches, and kept crowned and compacted by dragging or other adequate means so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles.

We all admit that the road that comes up to that standard will be a good road, and the Government is not going to put a cent on that road until it comes up to that standard, and the agents of the Government are to determine when it reaches that standard and therefore determine when the Federal proportion of the money shall be paid. Where is there room for scandal, waste, or extravagance in that?

Mr. BORLAND. Now, mark how your question has answered itself. You have provided for the improvement of 2,240,000 miles of road in this country.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I just wish to say that we are not providing for anything of the sort.

Mr. BORLAND. You are hoping to do that.

Mr. SAUNDERS. No; we are hoping to improve the post roads of the country, the mileage of which is nothing like the figures the gentleman has given.

Mr. BORLAND. You are not confining it to post roads.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; we are.

Mr. BORLAND. You are giving every road the right to participate, if it comes up to the standard of class C.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Oh, no.

Mr. BORLAND. You certainly are, and when you are doing that you are not providing the Federal machinery by which the Secretary of Agriculture could tell whether the roads even in the District of Columbia had come up to that class, not to mention the rest of the Union. You have not provided the inspectors, and you could not provide the inspectors to determine that question within the time necessary to make the annual payments. You have no machinery at all except the machinery for getting the money out of the Federal Treasury into the hands of the road boss. And that is not the worst of it. I want to say in answer to my friend from Colorado [Mr. SELDOMRIDGE] that the bill does not even provide for an equitable distribution of this money after it gets into the hands of the State. It holds out an invitation to some governors to build up a political machine. It says that the governor shall have the right to tell the Treasurer of the United States into whose hands the money shall be paid. I do not need to comment on that before a body of men of wide political experience like this.

Now, I believe that the solution of the road problem is infinitely deeper than paying $15, $20, $30, or $60 a mile in addition to the amount raised by the taxing power of the State under the pretense of rental. Of course we know it is not rental. I do not believe that is a solution of the problem. The great trouble in the solution of the good-roads problem is, first, that we have been working under a system of isolated local control and construction of roads, a system that we adopted from Great Britain at a time when Great Britain was a hermit nation, with her forests full of outlaws, and with 99 out of 100 of her young men going out of the country for an education. She has long since abandoned that system, and no other country ever adopted it. For 200 years we have tried to adapt that system to the construction of highways of a great country 3,000 miles in extent, whose great, burning need is the development of its internal resources. We can not do it.

The experience of every nation should teach us that the building of highways is a scientific proposition, that more than 80 per cent of the traffic of roads goes over less than 15 per cent of the roads, and will do so under any circumstances, whether the roads are improved or unimproved, in a country thickly settled or not. It necessarily tends that way, and we must have a scientific classification of roads in accordance with the traffic they bear. Nearly every progressive State in this country has come or is coming to the system of a State system of highways. What does that mean? It means that the State selects certain trunk lines. You may say that "I am against this thing if it does not go by my door." That is a narrow way to look at it. You may say it is a joy-ride proposition, but solid business men in every State have come to the idea of selecting a State highway commission clothed with legal power to classify roads as to the character in which they ought to be improved and maintained, and, secondly, not to improve any roads at all until ample power is given for the maintenance of those roads in the class to which they belong.

Those are the two problems to which we are to address ourselves, to get a scientific classification of the roads that must be improved to the highest degree, a classification of the secondary roads that are feeders, that must be improved to a secondary degree, and a third classification of roads that are local roads purely, and can be left in a more or less unimproved state.

Mr. HOWARD. You admit that all the trunk lines you speak of leading through your State and mine carry with them rural routes necessarily?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman made a statement a minute ago that 80 per cent of the travel was done over 15 per cent of the roads. I think that is a mistake. The Agricultural Department says that 90 per cent of the travel is done over 30 per cent, or, rather, not travel, but 90 per cent of the tonnage is hauled over 30 per cent of the roads. That is not the same thing, of course, because it means that the farmer in the sparsely settled country does not carry as much tonnage, but they use the road as much in carrying to the market their produce as they do on the roads where more tonnage is hauled.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, we have got to solve this problem on a different line from what it has been solved in the past, otherwise there is no solution of the problem. The road rental proposition will not solve the problem. Whether it is 30 or 15 per cent of the traffic, the gentleman from Georgia has indicated the same scientific judgment I had on the matter, that it would be foolish for us to try to improve or to induce to improve or to pay for improving, unless it was determined that the amount of traffic and the relation that it bore to the markets and to the proportion of the Postal Service would justify that improvement. It is not a question of how the roads might be brought to-day under improvement or in the future by the encouragement of a little money. It is a question of where the roads are needed, and they might be needed in a section where they now have the least chance of being built. That is where the rural man comes in, and the city man can count himself out except to contribute his share of the taxation. The roads are going to be built in most sections; not in sections where good roads would be built, but where they ought to be built for the purpose of commerce and market and getting the crops to the market from the country.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield again?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the gentleman maintain by his argument that the improvement of public highways does not help the city at all?

Mr. BORLAND. No; I said we could count ourselves out as to the distribution of the road money.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman said that the city could count itself out except to pay its proportion of the taxation. I hope the gentleman does not mean to convey the idea that the building of good roads will not help the cities as much as it will help the country, because the city is dependent on the contiguous country for its livelihood.

Mr. BORLAND. No; Mr. Chairman, I did not say anything of the kind. I said where the good roads may be needed most the taxing power or conditions are such that there is less likelihood of their being built than there is in other sections where the taxing power is greatest. But roads may be needed most both in behalf of the country and the cities and in behalf of the Postal Service——

Mr. SAUNDERS. And this bill will enable such roads to be built. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. BORLAND. I think not. If I thought so, I would be here advocating the bill instead of opposing it. [Applause.]

[Mr. BORLAND obtained leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

SUBSTITUTE BY MR. BORLAND.

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend an amount not exceeding $25,000,000 in any one year in cooperating with the States of the Union in improving, constructing, and maintaining rural highways available for use by the United States for post roads, military roads, and interstate-traffic roads. Such funds shall be apportioned among the several States as follows: One-half in the proportion that the mileage of the post roads within the State bears to the total mileage of post roads in the United States, exclusive of star routes, and one-half in the proportion that the commodities produced within the State bears to the total production of commodities in the United States.

SEC. 2. For the purpose of improvement, construction, and maintenance, the rural roads of the country shall be classified into three classes on the basis of the amount of traffic which the roads carry or are capable of carrying. Class A shall embrace interstate highways connected with a general system of highways throughout the United States; class B shall embrace State highways, main branches, and feeders for the interstate highways, which shall extend into every county within the State; class C shall embrace county highways and local post roads connected with a market town and with a main interstate or State highway.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of Agriculture shall, with the assistance of the office of public roads of the Department of Agriculture, establish standard specifications as to grades, drainage, bridges, culverts, roadbeds, and the surfacing of the various classes of roads, having in view the topography of the country, the character of the soil, the climate, the kind and accessibility of road material. The office of public roads of the Department of Agriculture shall continue the investigation and classification of scientific information upon the proper location, grading, drainage, construction, and maintenance of rural roads, and shall at all times furnish to State highway departments or highway engineers expert advice and assistance on such subjects.

SEC. 4. The governor of each State may make, under his hand and the seal of the State and file with the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, a statement setting forth: First, that the State has a highway department or a highway engineer with full legal powers to improve, construct, or maintain rural highways; second, the road or roads within the State to be improved, constructed, or maintained under each of the classes hereinbefore specified; third, the amount of funds available within the control of the highway department or highway engineer of the State for such improvement, construction, and maintenance, which shall not be less than double the allotment to which the State is entitled from the funds of the United States under the terms of this act; fourth, the amount and character of the work which the State will do within the next fiscal year, and the use which is desired to be made of the funds allotted to the State by the Secretary of Agriculture under the authority of this act. Such statement may be filed at any time after the approval of this act, and an annual statement showing necessary changes for the ensuing fiscal year shall be filed on or before the 20th day of January of each year. All subsequent statements after the first statement filed by the governor shall show in detail the amount of the improvement, construction, and maintenance of roads accomplished by the State in the prior fiscal year, together with the specific use which has been made of the allotment from the funds of the United States under the terms of this act. The Secretary of Agriculture shall examine said statement and determine: First, whether the State has a highway department or highway engineer clothed with full legal powers over the improvement, construction, and maintenance of rural roads; second, whether the work to be done by the State is feasible and practical within the estimate, and of a proper engineering character to bring the roads within the class or classes designated; third, whether the State under its constitution and laws can cooperate with the United States in the improvement, construction, and maintenance of the roads; fourth, whether a proper fund is provided for the maintenance of the system of roads within the State as constructed or proposed to be constructed. If the Secretary of Agriculture be satisfied on these points, he shall adopt the location and classification of the roads as specified by the governor of the State and shall allot to the State its proportion of the road fund created by this act for the fiscal year next ensuing. If the statement as filed by the governor shows a larger amount of improvement, construction, and maintenance of roads than the funds available, including the allotment from the funds of the United States, will be sufficient to accomplish, the Secretary of Agriculture shall withhold the funds until the estimate is reduced. If in any subsequent year after the allotment to a State of funds from the United States the statement of the governor fails to show improvement, construction, or maintenance of roads reasonably approximate to the estimate made, subject to the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture, he shall withhold the allotment of money under the terms of this act until the proportion of road work in the State is brought up approximately to the estimate submitted, having in view climatic conditions, increased cost of material, or any unforeseen events or factors.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to make rules and regulations for the purpose of carrying into effect this act, which rules shall include reasonable provisions for the proper scientific maintenance of the roads of the various classes as the same may be constructed. He shall not approve any estimate for the improvement or construction of roads without adequate provision for the maintenance of the roads so improved or constructed in the class to which they belong. The governor of the State may, with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, in any annual statement change the classification of particular roads.

SEC. 6. All acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY].

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of gratification that there is no question of the power of Congress to enact this legislation. The Constitution of the United States settles that question. The terms of the bill come within the power conferred on Congress "to establish post offices and post roads," and the only question here is whether or not it is necessary and proper for Congress to pass this bill in the interest of the people of the United States. Power often exists when there is no necessity for its exercise. I am more than glad to state that in the matter of this bill I indorse the principles contained in it and shall vote for the bill.

Next to religion and schools, the most important question confronting any country is that of transportation. Without adequate facilities to move its people and its products, it can not reach the highest degree of civilization. Life in an isolated community is of necessity circumscribed. A place whose products can not be taken to market without undue difficulty and to which the trade and life of the outside world do not penetrate is always slow in being developed. The railroad system has done more than any other one thing in opening up this country. The development of the West during the last 50 years is one of the most remarkable facts of history, and both its development and its prosperity are due almost directly to the railroads. The country's prosperity depends to a large extent upon the railroads, its arteries of commerce, which are necessary to carry the products of its farms and factories from the point of production to that of consumption. The railroads, in turn, must be fed with products brought from the farm, and these products must, in nearly all cases, be hauled in wagons to the place of shipment. The state of the country's roads therefore has a direct bearing on its commerce, and in particular does it affect the prices received by the farmer for his crop. It is the great farming class, the main dependence of this country, which will receive the greatest benefits from improvements made on the roads, and I am glad to vote for any benefits which can legitimately be conferred on this class.

Of the 91,972,266 people in this country in 1910, the rural population amounted to 49,348,883. It can thus be seen that the present bill directly benefits over half the people of this country. The greatest piece of legislation, perhaps, and the one which has revolutionized life in the country, is the establishment of rural mail service. By it news of the outside world is brought to the country community. If good roads were built, the life of the outside world would also find its way there and a check would be given to the movement, so general to-day, of emigrating to the larger towns and cities.

It has been said many times that the pioneers who came to this country were home builders. In building homes they built up the civilization of this country, and if there is one evil to-day that threatens more strongly than any other the permanency and high standards of our citizenship it is the breaking up of the homes in the country. It is true in my section, and I believe generally throughout the United States, that when a man has achieved a competency on the farm, although he may have the very best surroundings to be had in any country, he leaves the farm and goes to the city. I believe that the principles embodied in this bill will result in keeping that class of people in the country. With our improved facilities for delivering the mail, with the telephone, with good roads, the time will come when the country is much more thickly populated than at present; and the question I asked of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR] will be true—that with a population twice as great as it is now, with good roads everywhere, with rural carriers able to make their deliveries by automobile, there will be in many localities more than one delivery a day. [Applause.]

Better roads would also enable the farmer to sell his goods at market prices. The farmer of the present day is often unable to take advantage of the prevailing prices offered for his products by reason of his inability to get them to market, except at certain times when he finds that the roads can be traveled.

No other country to-day has as many miles of highway as has the United States. Also it must be added that no other country has as many miles of bad highways as has the United States. In this country, of the 2,199,645 miles of highways, only 190,679 miles are improved. The mail is carried on rural routes over 1,038,113 miles of roadway. At the present rate of improvement the day when all the roads will be put in good condition is too far distant for any of us to hope to see it. Even with Federal aid the task is too stupendous to be undertaken at one time. The present bill, however, contemplates the improvement of only a limited number of miles each year, in cost not to exceed $25,000,000 per annum. This will improve only a small part of the country's highways, but it will prove a stimulus to the States and communities to carry on the work, so that in time we may hope to see a network of improved roadways reaching over the entire area of the United States.

I am always glad to support a bill of such general benefit to all classes of citizens. However, it may be that I shall wish that some of the provisions of the present bill be clarified. One of them, I think, is substantially clear enough, but there seems to be some doubt about it. On page 5, line 3, embracing the roads in that class, it reads:

Class C shall embrace roads upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with adequate drainage and ample side ditches, with a roadway constructed so as to quickly shed water into the side ditches and kept crowned and compacted by dragging or other adequate means, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles.

Mr. Chairman, this is substantially the requirement of the Post Office Department for a road before they will inaugurate a rural delivery service. I do not mean that it follows word for word, but it is practically the same as is required by the regulations and rules of the department. I am of the opinion, in reading that provision of the bill, that it comes in any fair sense up to what is required by the Post Office Department before a rural delivery service is established, and that such requirements are substantially the same as the provisions of class C, as provided in this bill.

I will add that if there is any doubt about it, I shall offer an amendment that all roads over which rural delivery is maintained shall, unless the contrary be shown, come within that class. If that is done, it will give more miles of public highways that can be improved. Of course we may not improve these highways in one, two, or five years, but this bill is intended to be a beginning. It is hoped that it will stimulate road building in this country, and I believe the good that will come from it will be far greater than any of us can estimate at the present moment. I am heartily in favor of the bill, and shall vote for its passage.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART].

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the road question is not one that calls for eloquence, but for cool, careful, and businesslike deliberation. For a good many years the people in my home State have been much interested in good roads, and we have more improved roads than any like area in this country. One of the reasons, probably, that our roads are more generally improved than others is the convenience of good road-building material. Other States may not be so fortunate in that respect, but nevertheless an interest is being shown in road improvement throughout the country that is taking precedence over every other public question.

The business men's organizations, the farmers' institutes, the agricultural colleges, and the short-course farmers' schools are all devoting time to the consideration of the road question. Some weeks ago I sent out a letter calling the attention of the president of each farmers' institute in the district I represent to the fact that a road bill was pending in Congress and asking him to take the subject to his institute and set apart a half hour or so to consider it. I have had 11 replies from those institutes, and in every single instance the report has been in favor of a proposition whereby the State and the Government may enter into a half-and-half undertaking of improving and maintaining our roads on which mail is carried.

One of these reports is from a farmers' meeting at Winona Agricultural College. It says, in part:

MY DEAR MR. BARNHART: Your letter which had been sent out especially to farmers' institutes for expressions of opinion came to us here, as the institute was held in the assembly rooms of the college. We felt it to be an exigency, and so called a special night session, at which about 100 people, men and women, were present. There were leading farmers, college students, and business men here, so that the crowd was as cosmopolitan and representative as probably will ever be called together. I believe all were actuated by the best motives and that no one had an ax to grind. They were about equally divided in politics, and on the votes, which were taken after full discussion, there was not a single dissenting voice, so far as I could find, and I presided.

1. The proposal "that the Government build and control certain main highways across the country, from coast to coast or from big city to big city, etc.," looked to us like only a scheme of the automobile racers. We could not see how it could possibly benefit the ordinary farmer or city man of small means, because he does not have the time to use such a road even when he has the means.

2. "That the Government cooperate with the States by furnishing from year to year an amount of road fund, to be equaled by the people, for building and maintaining mail-route roads." This would be an acceptable scheme, but until the States themselves get their own road laws in better working conditions it would not be practicable.

3. "That the Government pay a stipulated amount per mile each year toward the upkeep of mail-route roads, if they are constructed according to specifications for first-class roads of their kind." This was approved with the further recommendation: "That the roads so drawing such money be built and maintained at all times according to the standards adopted by the United States Bureau of Public Roads." It was felt that unless some such restriction were placed upon the expenditure it would be a waste of public money. The money should not be spent indiscriminately nor given to most local authorities without wise reservation concerning its expenditure.

Very respectfully,

MILLARD CRANE, Chairman of Meeting.

Here is another one, from one of the most populous and prosperous agricultural counties in Indiana. It says:

Be it resolved, That we, the citizens of St. Joseph County, Ind., in farmers' institute assembled, do hereby ask the Hon. H. A. BARNHART to use his influence to effect a national law in conformity with the second proposition set forth in a letter from said BARNHART to this institute, viz: "That the Government cooperate with the States by furnishing from year to year an amount of road fund, to be equaled by the people, for building and maintaining mail-route roads."

WILLIAM O. CULLAR,
Chairman County Farmers' Institute.

The farmers of Elkhart County in their meeting resolved—

That the National Government cooperate with the States by furnishing from year to year an amount of money ior a road fund, to be equalled by the State, for building and maintaining rural-route roads.

In Kosciusko County the farmers' institute resolved—

That the Government cooperate with the States in furnishing from year to year an amount of road fund, to be equaled by the people, in keeping up the mail routes and public highways, and do not favor the coast to coast roads, as that will be entirely too much for a special class of automobile owners.

Seven other farmers' meetings passed similar resolutions, and were the reports all in from the many winter meetings of the farmers and business men I have no doubt but they would all read practically the same.

This morning a man who is somewhat interested in another line than building roads gave me some figures that appeal to me as very remarkable. He says the experts of the Agricultural Department say that it costs, by horse and wagon transportation, on the average road in the United States, 23 cents to move a ton of produce or freight a mile. In England, where the roads are practically all improved and where they use many more autotrucks than we use here, the average cost per mile is 7 cents. On the railroads a ton of freight transportation costs about 7½ mills per mile, and by the Erie Canal about 3 mills per mile. On this basis $1 will send a ton of ordinary freight by horse and wagon on our average road a little more than 4 miles, and in England about 15 miles. By railroad—carload rate—a dollar will send a ton of freight nearly 133 miles, by the Erie Canal about 233 miles, and by European canals about 500 miles. Also if a horse can move a ton of freight on a level road, it will require two horses to move that ton on a 10 per cent upgrade, four horses to move it on a 20 per cent upgrade, and eight horses to move it on a 33 per cent upgrade. We all recognize that upgrade is resistance, and if our improperly constructed roads contribute the same resistance, and they surely do, which we discover in the ascent of a road incline, the importance of improving our roads in order to contribute to the least cost of resistance in highway traffic is beyond question.

So far as I am personally concerned, I am locally interested in what is known as a cross-country highway—the Lincoln highway. I had a letter this morning from a banker in my home district, who urged me to vote for a hundred-million-dollar proposition to build a concrete road from New York to San Francisco. I wrote him, in answer to his letter, that first of all I thought it was my duty as a legislator to see to it that the largest possible number of people should be provided with at least ordinary roads for transportation before we spend millions for trunk lines. You say the automobilist wants a cross-country road. So some do, but the average automobilist does not. The average automobilist is a man who lives out in the country or in country towns, who is interested in driving hither and thither in a business or pleasure capacity, and not from New York to Chicago, nor Chicago to St. Louis, nor St. Louis to Denver, nor Denver to San Francisco. A coast-to-coast roadway would be a good thing principally for the comparatively few who could afford to take cross-country pleasure trips, but nine hundred and ninety-nine out of each thousand, or possibly more, of those who would help pay for such a road, if it be paid for with national funds, would never see it nor use it, and therefore the public would get little or no benefit. Of course, if the automobilists who want a long touring route, and the people who live adjacent to such route, want to build it, I am heartily in favor of such an enterprise, and this bill proposes to help such in the same proportion as other improved roads. But I can not believe that it would be just to build such an extensive driveway by Government aid and compel the other important highways of the country to wait.

Besides, Mr. Chairman, the country people have been helping to build river and harbor and public building and military and naval improvements in the big cities ever since the beginning of our Government, and in return for these Government taxes paid in we have been giving them an occasional package of garden seeds and now and then a farmer's bulletin, with promises of helpful legislation. But at last the Congress is beginning to give them the legislation they have so long deserved, and this bill is part of it.

Our transportation, as has been shown here, consists overwhelmingly of vicinity traffic, and I want to call attention especially to the importance of improving post roads—roads over which United States mail is carried. Nothing has contributed so much to the progress of the country, to the dissemination of general intelligence everywhere—and I think everybody agrees to that—as the delivery of mail to the rural communities. I speak advisedly when I say that with proper roads a mail carrier who now consumes 8 or 9 or 10 hours in making a trip over his route will make it in from 3 to 4 hours. Then the farmer will have his mail delivered to him as early in the morning as the business man, and no man in this country depends for his well-being more upon daily market reports than does the farmer. He is isolated and can not easily call up a market, but when he receives his morning paper he is as well advised as any other man, whether that man lives in city or country.

The rural carrier is also entitled to some consideration. He does not get a large salary. I think he is fairly well paid for his services, because I find there are many, many applications pending all the time from intelligent and enterprising young men who are anxious to take these rural-carrier jobs, but he ought to have a good roadway; he ought to have facility for getting to the patron of the rural mail as readily as possible. Then, too, with the parcel post the Government is going to become a sort of freight carrier, and because of that also we ought to have first-class mail-route roads. We are not confining this bill to the rural routes alone, but to all post roads; and after we have improved these, partly by the contribution that the Government is to make, partly by similar funds raised by the States, and partly by the inspiration this law will inaugurate in better road making, we will have rural route and post roads built up everywhere in splendid condition and the cross-country automobilist will find that instead of donating immense road-building funds by subscription, as he now expects to do, the people will build good roads according to this bill, in compliance with specifications that will be properly drawn, and there will be only short gaps here and there all over the United States which it will be necessary to build by private enterprise in order to give the automobilist continuous highways, not only from coast to coast but from north to south, and here, there, and everywhere as well.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly.

Mr. HULINGS. The gentleman said that the estimate he gets from the Agricultural Department is 23 cents per mile for moving a ton of freight by horsepower over a country road?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. And, then, that there was a great difference in the cost owing to the grade of the road?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. Does the gentleman know what the estimated grade of the road is on the average road which costs 23 cents per ton-mile?

Mr. BARNHART. I said that was the average cost; that is, up and down hill and on the level—the average cost per ton per mile under all reported conditions.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman kindly tell us how the department arrives at this conclusion—what they take into consideration, and how they figure this cost?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I only know what I received from the officials by means of a telephone inquiry. I did not ask anything further than if they knew, and was told that the average cost had been estimated at 23 cents per mile. And

I take it, gentlemen, that it is a reasonable estimate. I know that in my own country if a man drives 10 miles to market and takes a ton, it is considerable of a load and a large haul for $2.30.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not consider that request. The apportionment of time is in the hands of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY].

Mr. BOOHER. I would like to make further inquiry of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARNHART. I am profoundly grateful for this privilege, for I have more to say upon this important subject. And one of the things in my mind is the need of skill in road building. It is just as important that a road overseer have a technical knowledge of draining, grading, graveling, and finishing roads as any other overseer of important building improvements that require efficiency and permanency, because of large expenditure of money. The people of every community have seen much money and labor wasted through unworkmanlike road making, and this bill will remedy this by its provision that the State and Government road-making officials shall set forth how roads shall be constructed and kept in repair.

I quote from seeming reliable authority when I say that $250,000,000 are wasted on bad roads in the United States every year. Added to this the loss on haul, on storage, and extra food rates make a total expense of a billion dollars per year. This means a tax of $12.50 annually on every man, woman, and child in the country. Maybe these statistics are right and possibly wrong, but no statistics from anywhere or under any circumstances argue for bad roads. And quoting further along this line of argument, do good roads concern you? If you are one of the 30,000,000 people who live on farms in the United States, it is a fairly safe guess that you know something about bad roads. But if you are a city man, whose use of highways consists chiefly of the street railway, does the good-roads movement concern you? That question is best answered by asking another. When the prices of your table supplies go up as a result of scarcity in your market and you see prices paid the farmer but little changed, then you are vitally interested in good roads. Take wheat, for instance. Do you know why it is possible to corner the market in wheat? First of all, because wheat is scarce—the demand growing faster than the supply; but secondarily, because, owing to the condition of the roads, it is possible for the speculators to get possession of the whole year's crop of wheat. The West is the great granary of the wheat supply to-day; and in the West the wheat must be rushed to market in the clear, dry autumn days when the roads are hard. If the farmer held his wheat over, past the dry weather, in most counties he simply could not deliver during late autumn rains or early spring break-up when roads are a churn of mud. The result is for three months after each crop there is a glut of wheat at elevator, railroad, and water front. Thereby a large proportion of the crop goes into the hands of speculators. These storage charges and speculators' profits are added to the actual worth of the wheat, and both you and the man who raises the wheat must pay for the bad roads which necessitate marketing of the crop all at one time and whereby the speculator reaps his harvest at your expense.

As a matter of fact, America's country roads are so bad that it costs more to haul a ton of wheat from farm to market than to ship that ton from New York to Liverpool. You, Mr. Townman, and you, Mr. Farmer, pay for the unnecessary waste of those bad roads; the townman by the extra cost of what he eats, the farmer by lessened price for what he sells.

Oh, but you city chaps who want great boulevards built across the country say this is a "pork-barrel bill." Well, you may call it what you please, but "pork-barrel" legislation that directly and indirectly benefits everybody who pays Government taxes, as this bill does, and denies justice to nobody, is honest and fair and universally helpful and needful legislation, "pork" or no "pork." It will make farm life more profitable and more attractive; it will increase the profits to the man who grows our food and clothing, and reduce expenses for those who must buy them, as it will obviate the great loss in transportation and middleman speculation, which must fall on the shoulders of both the buyer and seller.

So much for the profit-and-loss features of this subject. And, now, just one or two more observations and I will have finished.

We read lots of editorial opinion and hear lots of talk on the importance of checking the drift from farm to city life. They tell us this ever-increasing abandonment of the peaceful and safe pursuit of farming for the city job is due to the dreariness of the country and the bright glare of the city. Is this due to the neglect of conveniences and comforts and beauty of the country and the profuse expenditure of money in cities to make the glow that attracts? Is it possible that we have neglected helping public improvements in the country and centered our appropriations in helps for cities? Might it be that country people are beginning to feel that most of the taxes they pay find their way to the upbuilding of cities, and in order to get their money back they quit the farms and go to towns, where life looks more pleasant because of superior improvements and conveniences?

Whatever it is that causes the drift from farm to city, every boy who leaves the farm contracts the possibilities of food production just that much, because the farm must produce less for loss of a husbandman and an additional city mouth is dependent on the diminished supply. Prices increase because fewer acres are tilled, or are so tilled as to produce less, and the increasing horde in town and city must reap although they have not sown.

The redress? Keep the boys and girls on the farms and out of the sweatshops of parasite dependence. If "he who maketh two blades of grass grow where one grew before is a public benefactor," then he who causeth but one blade to grow where two grew before is a reckless despoiler. But there is not enough attraction in the commonplace vocation of making two blades of grass grow where one grew before to hold the average boy and girl safe from the city glare which attracts like the bright flame allures the moth. And if the glamor and novelty and activity of city life is the magnet which draws the boys and girls from larger possibilities on the farms, there must be counter efforts to hold them in the rural homes.

And so, Mr. Chairman, we are brought face to face with the stern realization that we need more contented and prosperous farmers for the betterment of mankind generally. For many years we have been legislating in favor of city welfare and letting rural interests take care of themselves. But we are seeing things differently now. This administration has taken a long step toward taking the burden of Government taxes off the necessities of life and placing them on the luxuries and the wealth. It has lowered tariff taxes on the toiling masses and added them, by the income-tax law, to the responsibility of the wealthy who ought to pay their full share of public expenses. It has passed the Lever bill, which provides for more general education of farmer boys and girls. It will pass a law making it possible to borrow money on such terms that many who can not now do so may own farms. And it will pass this bill which will send millions back to the country people, who paid the money in, to help improve the public roads so the farmer and the city man may have more economic means of handling the necessities of life and also make rural life more inviting, more advantageous, and more prosperous. And they deserve this from a Congress which is obligated to help those who help themselves, rather than continue the long-established policy of enriching him who already hath by taking from another that which is rightfully his.

Mr. Chairman, the city man who votes against this bill thereby strikes at his own best interests and denies to the farmer the fair share of public favor which belongs to him, because he has paid his money in taxes for it. Surely there will be few to deny this act of modest justice to the millions.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I suppose there is no greater civilizer than good roads. Few things contribute more to the comfort or prosperity of a community than good highways. In the building of good roads we have not kept pace with the progress of our country in other directions and in other lines of activity. It is a fact that we have bad roads all over the country, and the recognition of that fact is responsible for the demand from every part of our country for remedial legislation. I regret exceedingly that this bill does not meet that demand. I have studied this bill carefully, and I have great misgivings with regard to many of its provisions. I very gravely doubt whether it will accomplish, in any marked degree, any of the things which its sponsors claim for it. It is, indeed, very unfortunate that so worthy a cause should be carried in such a dilapidated vehicle. The result of the enactment of this bill, so far as the advancement of good roads is concerned, is questioned by many of the Members of this House.

One of the difficulties in the way of securing good roads throughout the country to-day lies in the fact that the various States have not enacted proper laws for the building of roads. With but slight changes in the laws for building highways, many of the States have been going on for a century under the old and antiquated methods of road construction. The result is that it too often happens that the funds collected for building roads have been foolishly expended, and that much of the work done upon our highways left them in a worse condition than they were in before the work was performed. The difficulty has been that no scientific standards for the building and repairing of highways have been established in this country. The only wonder is that our public roads are in as good condition as we find them to-day when we consider the haphazard methods that have been employed to improve them.

Mr. Chairman, the enactment of legislation upon this subject should mark a new era of highway construction in the United States. A good-roads measure should provide for scientific standards of road construction and repair and businesslike methods established for enforcing these standards in all work upon public highways. But instead of establishing such standards and providing such a scheme the bill before us recognizes the same low standards of road construction, as well as the old methods of working the highways, which have resulted in the most deplorable condition in which we now find our public roads. At the beginning of such an era we should, it seems to me, favor Federal aid only for the construction of permanent highways, leaving temporary construction and repair solely to the local authorities.

Section 4 of this bill attempts a classification of public highways for which Federal aid may be given, in which the roads are classified into three divisions; but it is especially provided that each division shall embrace roads "upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality." Any schoolboy can see at a glance how foolish it is to establish such a standard for the construction of highways for which the Government is to expend annually $25,000,000, instead of providing that the highways for which Federal aid may be given shall embrace only those roads where the grade does not exceed a certain per cent. In fixing the standard, so far as grade is concerned, by providing that no incline shall be steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, it will be seen that if a road extended up the side of the Ozark Mountains the grade might be 45°, and the natural topography of the locality would make it reasonably necessary for such a grade.

Again, this bill makes provision for Federal aid for macadam or concrete roads at the rate of $60 per mile; for shell or gravel roads, $30 per mile; and for ordinary dirt roads, $15 per mile. One of the counties in the State which I have the honor in part to represent on the floor of this House by actual experiment last year determined the actual cost of building roads such as are designated in class C and found that the actual cost was less than $30 per mile.

It is a matter of general knowledge that a good, well-constructed macadam road will cost from $3,000 to $6,000 per mile, and that a concrete road costs from $6,000 to $15,000 per mile. Keeping in mind the cost of these different types of roads for which it is proposed to grant Federal aid, let us examine the provisions of the bill to ascertain whether or not the Federal aid proposed is properly and equitably distributed so as to produce the best results, so far as the building of good roads is concerned. For roads that cost from $6,000 to $15,000 per mile to construct, it is proposed that the Government shall contribute for each mile of road so constructed the sum of $60. For the class C road, or the ordinary dirt road, which costs not to exceed $30 per mile, it is provided that the Government shall contribute toward the construction thereof $15 per mile, or one-half of the entire cost of the road. The proposition resolves itself, therefore, to this: The Government will pay from one-half of 1 per cent to 1 per cent toward the building of concrete or macadam roads, the very best and highest types of highway—a permanent highway—but will contribute 50 per cent of the cost of the construction of dirt roads, or the poorest type of highway. This, too, in view of the fact that the dirt road is not permanent and the work must be done every year or two.

Mr. Chairman, my contention is that this principle is entirely wrong. Bad as this principle is, however, it is not the worst feature found in the bill. I am strongly in favor of good roads, and I favor the proposition of the Federal Government contributing toward the construction of good, permanent roads, but the proposition provided by section 4 of this bill makes it possible for the various States to take from the Treasury of the United States $25,000,000 in a single year, and expend not a penny of it upon the highways of this country.

Section 4 provides that before the 1st day of March each year the governor of any State may file a statement with the Secretary of Agriculture, setting forth the number of miles and the locality of roads in such State which he claims to be in each of the three classes—A, B, and C. Thereafter the Secretary of Agriculture shall consider such statements and determine which of the roads therein mentioned are in such respective classes.

That at the end of each fiscal year the United States shall pay, on account of roads so determined to be in classes A, B, and C, as follows: On each mile in class A, the sum of $60; on each mile in class B, the sum of $30; and on each mile in class C, the sum of $15. * * * That such payments of money made by the United States, as hereinbefore provided, shall, during the ensuing year, be applied to the construction, maintenance, or extension of the respective roads for which paid; * * * that if such sums are not so expended upon the construction, maintenance, or extension of said roads, respectively, during the ensuing fiscal year, then at the end of such fiscal year nothing whatever shall be paid by the United States on account of any road upon which there has been default in such expenditure.

This is the only instance where the Government of the United States does not see that something of value is received for an expenditure. In fact, this is the only instance that I can recall where the Government pays in advance for any public work or improvement, but here it is contemplated to pay out $25,000,000 for work to be performed, as the bill states, during the ensuing fiscal year, upon certain roads which the governors of the various States shall designate as being in one of the three classes. In view of the fact that this is the only exception to the general rule that Government work shall be paid for when completed, what safeguards have the committee thrown around this fund to insure the United States that this money will be expended upon the highways for which the payment was made? By turning to the bill we find this language:

That if such sums are not so expended upon the construction, maintenance, or extension of said roads, respectively, during the ensuing fiscal year, then at the end of such fiscal year nothing whatever shall be paid by the United States on account of any road upon which there has been a default in such expenditure.

Instead of a provision that the money shall be returned to the United States it is proposed that $25,000,000 per year be paid out on an estimate to improve certain roads during the ensuing year, and that if the money is not so expended, then nothing will be paid on account of the identical roads for the next year. The proposition is so framed up that the States can fool the Government once and secure $25,000,000 for work on certain roads, and then not do the work; but in order to get $25,000,000 for the next year it will be necessary for the governors of the various States to file with the Secretary of Agriculture a different list of roads, and the only limit that can be placed upon such a draft on the Federal Treasury is that there is a limit to the number of miles of highways in the United States. And all this is proposed in the interest of good roads.

Mr. SAUNDERS. May I interrupt the gentleman? He is under a misapprehension about that, and I will point it out to him in a minute. The right to receive that money, so far as the State is concerned, has already accrued by reason of the fact that for the preceding year it has kept those particular roads up to type; and this is just a requirement that the money it has earned by keeping the roads up to type shall be put into road improvement next year.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is mistaken. The bill provides that at the end of the fiscal year the Government shall pay certain sums of money on account of roads that it intends to construct and maintain the next year.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Not at all.

Mr. GOOD. The entire structure of this bill——

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the gentleman point to that feature of the bill which he thinks conveys that meaning?

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman is pointing simply to section 3.

Mr. GOOD. I do not think that section 4 is capable of any other construction.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will you point out the section of the bill that carries that meaning.

Mr. GOOD. If the gentleman will turn to the latter part of section 4, he will find that it provides that on the 1st day of March of each year the governor shall file a statement with the Secretary of Agriculture, and that thereafter the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine the number of miles of road of each class it is proposed to build or improve.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The operations under section 3 are entirely distinct from the operations in that section of the bill from which you are reading. They have no relation whatever.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that I have been reading from the bill and I do not see how any other conclusion can be drawn.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will say to the gentleman that he read from the portion of the bill that relates to expenditures under classes A, B, and C type of roads, and which does not relate to expenditures under section 3.

Mr. GOOD. If my statement to the gentleman was that I was reading from section 3, it was in error. I have no contention with the committee with regard to section 3. It contains the best provisions found in the bill. What I am complaining about is the provisions found in section 4, and in order that there may be no misunderstanding with regard to what section 4 contains—for I contend that its provisions are not only foolish but even vicious, opening up the road to gross frauds on the Federal Treasury—I propose to insert in my remarks section 4 of the bill. It reads as follows:

SEC. 4. That certain roads in the States which are adapted to use by the United States as rural post roads shall be divided into three classes to be known as class A, class B, and class C.

Class A shall embrace roads upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track composed of macadam or other material of equal utility and cost, constructed and maintained in such manner that it shall have a smooth, firm surface.

Class B shall embrace roads upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track composed of shells, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay or other material of equal utility but less expensive than macadam, constructed and maintained in such manner that it shall have a smooth, firm surface.

Class C shall embrace roads upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with adequate drainage and ample side ditches, with a roadway constructed so as to quickly shed water into the side ditches and kept crowned and compacted by dragging or other adequate means so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles.

That on or before the 1st day of March in each fiscal year the governor of any State may file in the office of the Secretary of Agriculture a statement setting forth the location and the number of miles of roads in such State which he claims to be in each of classes A, B, and C, respectively; and if such State have a State highway department then his said statement may be accompanied by a report from such State highway department showing the total number of miles of roads in such State in each of classes A, B, and C, the location of such roads, a description in detail of their physical features, the material, manner, and, as far as may be, the cost of their construction and the manner and cost of their maintenance.

That the Secretary of Agriculture shall consider such statements and determine which of the roads mentioned therein are in class A, which in class B, and which in class C, and make a report of his said determinations to the respective governors, filing such statements, on or before the 20th day of the following June.

That no charge shall be made for so considering and determining such statement of any governor if the same shall be accompanied by a report from the State highway department of such State as hereinbefore provided; but in all other cases there shall be deducted 10 per cent of the amount which shall be payable on account of the roads in such State under the provisions of this act.

That at the end of each fiscal year the United States shall pay on account of the roads so determined to be in classes A, B, and C, as follows: On each mile in class A the sum of $60, on each mile in class B the sum of $30, and on each mile in class C the sum of $15: Provided, That if in any State the aggregate of said sums would exceed the amount which for that fiscal year has been apportioned to such State under this act to be expended under the provisions of this section, then said sums per mile shall be reduced pro rata so that their aggregate shall not exceed said amount.

That nothing whatever shall be paid by the United States under the provisions of this section for any road which does not clearly come within the requirements of class A, B, or C, as hereinbefore defined.

That such payments shall be made, to such officers of the respective States as the governors thereof shall designate as being entitled to receive the same, by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Secretary of Agriculture.

That such payments of money made by the United States as hereinbefore provided shall, during the ensuing year, be applied to the construction, maintenance, or extension of the respective roads for which paid, and that in addition thereto the State or civil subdivisions thereof shall, during said ensuing fiscal year, expend in the construction, maintenance, or extension of said roads an amount equal to the amount so paid by the United States; that if such sums are not so expended upon the construction, maintenance, or extension of said roads, respectively, during ensuing fiscal year, then at the end of such fiscal year nothing whatever shall be paid by the United States on account of any road upon which there has been a default in such expenditure; that the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine whether such expenditures have been so made, and to aid him in such determinations that the proper officers of the State shall make such showing as he shall require.

I do not see how anyone interested in the real forward movement for the building of good roads can look with favor upon this section of the bill. I do not believe that section 4 will be retained in any good-roads law that is enacted by Congress.

It is a mistake to assume that by the enactment of a law granting Federal aid for highway construction our good-roads problem will be settled. The enactment of this or of any statute granting Federal aid will not solve the problem. Indeed, more will have to be done before good roads will be built throughout the country. Unpopular as it may seem, I firmly believe that good, permanent roads will only be a reality when the land adjacent to or in close proximity to good, permanent roads is assessed for a proportion of the benefit which the building of such roads will give to such land. The local authorities can not and will not alone build good, permanent roads in any State. The National Government can not and should not alone embark upon such a project; but I believe the final solution of this question will be the joint action by the Federal Government, the State or local authorities, and the owners of the land that lies in close proximity to the permanent roads constructed. By such joint action we can eventually build a system of good roads throughout the country that will meet the demands of commerce and will be responsive to public sentiment.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, when the question was first up as to paying money out of the Federal Treasury for good roads I was very much opposed to it; but my cooperation in favor of such legislation was always based upon the theory that we were going to lay down a fundamental law under which the States of the Union were to be given an opportunity to cooperate with the National Government in the construction of good roads. My belief was that we were going to propose a law that would work automatically and would prevent the States from getting money out of the Federal Treasury unless they really performed work. This bill, in my judgment, does not do that; and I could not under any circumstances vote for this bill.

This bill provides for the payment of the Federal money to the State treasurers before the States do any work whatever, and it does not require them to do the work at all. It only imposes a penalty to the extent that it refuses to pay the money in the succeeding year if they fail to expend the money that is given this year.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does my colleague mean to have us understand that the Government of the United States shall appropriate a certain sum of money, to Illinois, for example, supposed to be for road purposes, and that the State of Illinois can use that money to pay for its militia or some other purpose?

Mr. MADDEN. It need not use it for any purpose unless it chooses, according to the terms of this bill. All that that State or any other State of the Union will be required to do under the terms of this bill will be to make available an amount equivalent to the amount paid by the Federal Treasury. The mere making of the amount available by the State does not require the State to expend what is available in order to get the money out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the construction of good roads, and I want to see them constructed all over the Union, and I would like to see the Federal Government cooperate with the States, but I want to see the Federal Treasury protected while the Government of the United States is cooperating with the States.

This is really a pork-barrel bill. It can not be considered in any other way. I have always feared that in the enactment of a law for Federal cooperation with the States in the construction of good roads we might reach a stage where political scandal would ensue; and if this law were to go into effect, nothing short of a political scandal from one end of this country to the other would ensue from its operation.

What we ought to do would be to lay down a principle with which every State must comply; and that principle ought to involve the expenditure of money by the State before the Federal Government cooperates. I assume that perhaps this bill will be amended in some such particular before it is enacted into law. But under no circumstances ought it to be enacted unless it is amended.

Why, I am astounded to think that these men who have been working so assiduously and patriotically for the purpose of building up the country by the construction of good roads, and the cooperation of the Federal Government to that end, have so far forgotten their duty to the people of the United States as to provide for the payment of money out of the Federal Treasury to the extent of $25,000,000 in a single year without requiring the States to which the money is to be paid to expend one single dollar of that money in the construction of roads.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield to me again?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. McKENZIE. Who places this money in the Treasury? Is it not the people of the respective States? Are they not getting back their own?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I had not considered it in that sense at all. If you are going to appropriate money for a given purpose it ought to be applied for that purpose and for no other purpose, and there is no excuse that can be made that will justify the payment of Federal money out of the Federal Treasury to the treasury of any State in the Union unless the provisions of the law have been complied with.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Previously complied with?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; previously complied with.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I am with you on that.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BARTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BARTON] is recognized.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, I am not at all surprised to see the Members representing city districts oppose this measure; neither am I surprised to hear it referred to as a pork-barrel measure. My experience here teaches me that a pork-barrel measure is a measure that distributes the people's money and benefits generally and uniformly throughout the country and a statesman's measure is one where just a few big cities get the direct benefits of the expenditures; and, quite naturally, the press representing these cities do not let a chance go by to emphasize the definition.

I did hope for once these Members would look over the high wall of provincialism that they have erected along their corporation lines and see the broad fertile country that feeds them, but of course am disappointed.

In the distribution of the revenues of the Government of the United States those living in the cities receive substantially 85 per cent of the appropriations made by Congress, while less than 15 per cent is appropriated for the direct benefit of those living in agricultural States, notwithstanding that at least half of the revenues of the Government is contributed by the people who live in rural districts.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] seems to see a great injustice in comparing the amount that will be received by Nebraska and Connecticut, their population being quite similar, Nebraska being apportioned $506,250 and Connecticut $218,750. I would direct his attention to the fact that the Government uses in Connecticut 6,437 miles of post road and in Nebraska 33,320 miles. To make equal and just apportionment for the roads actually in use by the Government, if there has been discrimination, it has been against rather than for Nebraska.

The road is a public highway, open to the world. The Government uses it to do its business. The joy rider from the city cranks his automobile and spins over mile after mile of the public road praising it here and condemning it there, but roads do not come without effort no more than do orchards, fields of grain, and other artificial improvements. Some one must do the work to build them and keep them in repair. This is and has been done in my State solely by the farmers.

When the railroads were pushed through this country subsidies were granted, which means that the entire people donated to build them, and we are to-day paying these same roads $52,000,000 per annum to carry the mail; possibly this sum is not at all out of reason; but, sir, is it out of reason, if you please to so call it, to the farmers of this country to help them in their road building so long as the Government uses this mileage every day for her mail carriers?

Good roads benefit everybody. They not only make adjacent property more valuable but they enable the farmer to get his produce to market at a lower cost. They bring the city and country districts into closer touch with each other and more nearly than any other appropriation benefit the entire people.

Good roads and road building is one of the live subjects of to-day. Some of our States have already expended millions of dollars to keep in step with this march of progress, and the people of these States are proud of the improvements and achievements. Some contend that road building should be done solely by the States, but these same people would not advocate that States must take the entire financial responsibility of deepening adjacent harbors and dredging rivers. Their argument in its narrowness can only apply to roads which more directly afford benefit to the farming community and whose expense of building and upkeep has been solely by the farmer. These same advocates cry for a railroad in Alaska and for intercoastal waterways with an appropriation far in excess of this appropriation, but by all means this must not be made as the direct benefit is with the farmer and not with the favored classes. The Steel Trust will get none of this business; the big shipbuilders will not have a chance to figure on getting a big percentage; there will be no chance for the railroads to get a slice of the appropriation; the Army or Navy can neither one profit through this expenditure; big contractors will not be enriched; these benefits will go direct to the farmer. That is why I am for it.

I believe there are Members enough on this floor who are in favor of improving rural conditions to pass this measure, and while we know that the appropriation is small, the method primitive, we also know the appropriation is large enough to stimulate road building in the States, and when the matter is presented each State will map out a plan that will ultimately result in a good-roads system throughout the Nation.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the principle of national aid to public roads, and am earnestly supporting House bill 11686, introduced by the gentleman from Missouri, Hon. D. W. SHACKLEFORD, chairman of the Committee on Roads, on January 16 of this year.

Eight years ago I introduced a bill providing for an appropriation by the Federal Government for this purpose. I thought at the time, and still think, that bill the most practicable one yet introduced on the subject. I desire to have it read at the Clerk's desk.

A bill (H. R. 146) to distribute the surplus in the Treasury of the United States to the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia for the sole purpose of improving the roads therein.

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury at the end of each fiscal year to take an account of all the funds in the Treasury of the United States, and after deducting from said sum the amounts required by law to be kept in said Treasury, the remainder, if any, shall be declared a surplus.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to immediately provide for the distribution of said surplus, not exceeding $25,000,000 annually during the continuance of this law, on a per capita basis, to the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, to be computed from the last general census taken by the national authorities, and shall prorate the same accordingly for the sole purpose of improving the postal roads in said States, Territories, and District of Columbia, under such rules and regulations as the States, Territories, and District of Columbia may provide, and said Secretary shall immediately notify the governors of said States and Territories and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the amounts due each, and that the same will be paid over to such person or persons as may be duly authorized by said States, Territories, and the District of Columbia to receive and receipt for the same.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the governors of the several States and Territories and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make a full and complete report to the Secretary of the Treasury on the 15th day of November of each year what legislation, rules, and regulations have been adopted for the expenditure of said funds upon the postal roads, the manner in which the same has been spent, and the results accomplished. And it shall be the duty of the said Secretary to submit said reports to Congress on the first day of each regular session.

I have introduced this bill in every Congress during the past eight years. During the last session of Congress the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], and others made a study of all the bills that had been introduced on this subject, and as a result the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] introduced a bill very similar to the one now pending. The pending bill has received the strongest support of any measure of the kind yet brought before the House, and as it embraces the principles of the bill I have advocated for so long, and starts the work of national aid to public roads, I am heartily in favor of it.

Virginia will participate in this appropriation under section 3 of the bill and will receive $591,250 annually. This section is as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cooperate with the officers of the several States having lawful authority in that behalf in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads; that between the 1st day of February and the 30th day of June in each fiscal year the Secretary of Agriculture and the officer or officers of each State having lawful power to act for the State may jointly consider and determine the roads in such State which, under the provisions of this section, may be constructed and maintained during the next fiscal year, and the material, character, and manner of such construction and maintenance; that such construction and maintenance shall be conducted under such supervision as shall have been previously agreed upon by the Secretary of Agriculture and said officer or officers of said State; that in no case shall the United States bear more than one-half of the cost of the construction and maintenance of any road under the provisions of this section; that the Secretary of Agriculture shall not commence such joint construction of any road in any State until the portion of the cost thereof which is to be provided otherwise than by the United States has been made available.

Every argument is in favor of this proposition, and no substantial argument can be urged against it.

Undoubtedly the power of the Government to make appropriations for this purpose is ample and can be defended.

The power is expressly given to Congress by the Constitution "to provide for the general welfare," and the general welfare of the country demands at this time nothing so imperatively as it does a good system of public roads—a thing which we can never have without the aid of the Federal Government.

The exercise of this power to aid in the building of public roads is more than 100 years old. As far back as Jefferson's first administration Congress made provision for a national road from Georgia to New Orleans, which was completed during Jefferson's last term and of which there is a map in the Library of Congress.

In 1816 Henry Clay made a speech in advocacy of the construction by the General Government of an extensive system of turnpikes and canals. He was ably seconded by John C. Calhoun.

At the next session of Congress, in 1817, Calhoun took the lead in advocating a bill to set apart and pledge the bonus of the national bank and the shares of the United States as a permanent fund for constructing roads and canals and improving the navigation of water courses.

In 1818 Clay made another speech on the subject of internal improvements, in which, after an elaborate argument upon the constitutionality of the subject, he discusses the great benefit of canals and turnpikes to the country. His remarks would apply to turnpikes at the present time. He said:

I think it very possible that the capitalist who should invest his money in one of these objects might not be reimbursed 3 per cent annually upon it, and yet society in various forms might actually reap 15 or 20 per cent.

And again he said:

Of all the modes in which a Government can employ its surplus revenue none is more permanently beneficial than that of internal improvements. Fixed to the soil, it becomes a durable part of the land, itself diffusing comfort and activity and animation on all sides.

Mr. Clay was an untiring and strenuous advocate of the Cumberland Road—the great national pike to extend from Cumberland, Md., to St. Louis. The bill for the first section of this road passed Congress March 29, 1806, which authorized the President, Mr. Jefferson, to appoint three commissioners to lay out the road from Cumberland to the Ohio River. This road had many ups and downs during successive administrations, but by the time railroads had begun to loom up it had been completed to Vandalia, Ill., at an expense to the Government of nearly $7,000,000, a sum which meant then many times to the Government what that amount of money would mean now.

In the Eighteenth Congress Thomas H. Benton fathered the bill to lay out a road from the border of Missouri to the boundary line of the United States, and thence, with the consent of Mexico, to the frontier of New Mexico. In his 30 years in the Senate he attributed the waning interest in the subject to the application of steam to boats and railway trains. He uses the following language:

The progress of events has drawn the whole subject—the subject of a system of national internal improvements, once so formidable and engrossing the public mind—from the Halls of Congress and discussion of the people. Steamboats and steam cars have superseded turnpikes and canals.

Even great works accomplished by Congress at vast cost, after long and bitter debates, and deemed national at the time, have lost their character and sunk into the class of common roads. The Cumberland Road, which cost $6,700,000, and was a prominent subject in Congress for 34 years, from 1802, when it was conceived, to 1836, when it was abandoned to the States. This road, once so absorbing the public money and public attention, has degenerated into a public highway and is entirely superseded by the parallel railway.

There is no real distinction, so far as the public good and welfare is concerned, between the aiding of public roads and the aiding of waterways, and yet our waterways and harbors have been aided to so colossal an extent as to dwarf and finally eclipse our equally valuable highways.

There can be no question of the popular demand for this legislation.

I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a set of resolutions adopted by the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union, of Cumberland County, Va., that well expresses the popular feeling on this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON GOOD ROADS.

We, your committee on good roads, beg to report—

First. That we believe this to be the most important problem that confronts the people of the State to-day.

Development is what the State of Virginia needs above everything else, and we can not do this without good roads. This pressing need of the agricultural interests of the State demands prompt and heroic action.

Second. And whereas the National Government is using a large portion of our roads for handling the mails we earnestly solicit its aid in building the roads over which the mails are carried and urge that the National Government furnish liberal aid to the State and the subdivisions thereof.

Third. Resolved, that we heartily indorse the efforts now being made by our Representatives in Congress for said aid, and, further, that we will indorse and support only such men as are willing to do all they can to aid rural Virginia in securing better roads, and we also urge every possible aid to our highway commissioner in his efforts for the betterment of our roads.

Fourth. Our Government is founded on the principle of the greatest good to the greatest number of citizens, and since our Government has expended many millions of dollars on our rivers and harbors, of which we are justly proud, we now urge that some of these millions be turned into the good-roads channels, that the great mass of our people may be directly benefited thereby.

Our order is built and maintained on the one idea—cooperation—and we urge each and every member of our union to cooperate with the county, State, and national authorities in bringing about this consummation so devoutly desired.

And last, but not least, we urge our governor and the General Assembly of Virginia to use their good offices in formulating and enforcing laws for the building and maintaining all the roads of our Commonwealth in such manner as their local needs may require; and we further urge that only competent men be employed in building and maintaining our roads, to the end that the public may get value received for its money.

A. B. JENKINS,
Secretary Cumberland County Union.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. The importance of good roads is so apparent it will not be questioned by anyone.

The necessity for better roads in many parts of this country is the greatest need of the hour. The States and counties can not build them. The right kind of roads can only be built, and will only be built, when the National Government lends a helping hand. If we are ever to have a system of roads in this country to compare with those of the other enlightened nations of the world, they will have to be built by the aid of the Federal Government. If the agricultural communities of this country are ever to be thoroughly developed and made desirable as places of abode during all seasons of the year, it can only be done when the Federal Government has determined to aid in the construction of proper highways and turnpikes.

The cost of transportation is the vital question in all modern commerce. With the world's markets in which to dispose of our products, our success and prosperity is largely dependent on costs of carrying our products to these markets. The cost of carrying a ton 100 miles in England is $2.35; in Germany, $2.25; in France, $2; in the United States, 72 cents, the cheapest freight rates in the civilized world, and we have very properly regulated them. On the other hand, the cost of moving our products from the farms to the railroad stations is from two to four times as much as it is in France or Germany. This part of the cost of transportation to the markets of the world is just as vital to our success and the development of our foreign trade as is the railroad freight.

All the progressive nations of Europe are giving national aid to their highways, while our Government is following the example of the South American nations, thereby imposing a burden of millions of dollars annually upon our producers; and a glance at the condition of the South American countries ought to convince us of the error of our ways. That land, so prodigal in its resources, is still more affluent in the number and availability of its waterways, and yet some of its important nations have burdened themselves with debts for railroads, which have weighted them down, while their domestic commerce is largely transported upon the packsaddle.

What a different picture has been presented by the countries of Europe. A splendid system of roads has been inaugurated by those countries. The great Napoleon, following the example set by the Roman Empire, built an extensive system of roads through France, and now millions each year are expended by the French Government in keeping up these roads and making new roads. This work employs thousands of persons, and now they have 350,000 miles of well-paved roads. The central Government of England began to improve the roads in that country in 1835, and now $15,000,000 is being expended yearly upon their roads. Macaulay, in writing of the condition of the public roads in England prior to 1835, gives a description of them that is applicable to our roads nearly 75 years later. He says:

The fruits of the earth were sometimes suffered to rot in one place, while a few miles distant the supply fell short of the demand. One general cause of the badness of the roads was the defective state of the law. Every parish was bound to repair the roads which passed through it, and thus a sparse and impoverished parish was often compelled to maintain highways between rich and populous towns.

The farming element in the country constitutes about 35 per cent of its population, and it is not fair or equitable to expect it, unaided, to build and maintain the public highways of the country. It creates the wealth of the Nation, which largely finds its way into the pockets of other people, and yet has been required, unaided, to maintain the highways of the Nation. It has produced an amount of wealth within the past 10 years equal to one-half of the entire national wealth, and though but little more than one-third of the population, it has contributed more than two-thirds of the amount needed to support the Government; and yet up to this time its just demands for aid in building a good system of thoroughfares has gone unheeded.

Let the farmer withhold his hand from the plow for two seasons and the grass will grow in your thoroughfares, barnacles and bilge water will rot your ships as they lie idle at your docks, cobwebs will festoon your counting houses, owls and bats will usurp your warehouses, your children will clamor to you for bread, and we will gather in this Chamber with pallor in our faces.

Who are the most trustworthy guardians of the Republic? Why, sir, those whose activities cluster around the home, whose virtues are those of the family, and whose patriotism springs from and is fostered by the rooftree. Such men are not blown about by every wind of doctrine, but are the ultimate and supreme hope for the conservation of our institutions.

It is but just that a class of our population which furnished so much of the greatness of the Nation and to the support of the Government, and hitherto has gotten so little from the National Government, should receive all the aid that can be given to it constitutionally.

While the country has advanced in area, in population, and in wealth, and along all lines of science, trade, and industry, no advancement has been made in the condition of our roads in many sections of the country during the past 100 years.

The statement of the average cost of transportation from the farm to the railroad which I made a few minutes ago demonstrates what an immense financial advantage a good system of roads would be to the farmers of this country. And of vital and pressing moment to the national welfare is the fact that a good system of roads would check the tendency of the people to leave the farm and go to the city. The drift has taken from the farm much of the bone and sinew essential to a successful carrying on of our agriculture. It is producing an unhealthy congestion in large centers of population. The problem of getting young men to go back to the country from the cities and those already there to remain in the country is growing graver every day. The State and Nation alike have been wisely contributing to the advantages of the country as a place of residence. A more extensive system of schools is being inaugurated each year. Circulating libraries are doing much to add to the comfort of country life; the rural free delivery of mails and the parcel post make a great and permanent inducement to such a life. How these advantages would be enhanced by a system of good roads every intelligent man can see. Every mile of turnpike would secure to the farmers on both sides what political economists call "the unearned increment" just as the proximity to the railroad or the church or the schoolhouse does; and with the main permanent thoroughfares in good condition more time and heart would be given to the farmer to improve the plantation road. The wear and tear of his team, which is his capital, would be greatly lessened. The increase in value of his land would be greatly increased. The development of a neighborhood with such thoroughfares would proceed in geometrical ratio.

Our great cities are augmenting their population in an accelerated ratio. Some day, without warning, they may tell a tale of disaster, and then there will be no escape or refuge save in the immunity, the stability, and the conservatism of the country.

Let the General Government foster this great enterprise not only at the behest of justice but of wisdom. For whatever confirms or strengthens the agricultural interests performs the same for every other interest. Upon the strength and security of the farmer rests the integrity and security of the Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, five minutes is not a very lengthy time in which to discuss this bill. I am very much interested in the subject of good roads, but I do not see that this bill is going to do anything toward the accomplishment of that object. It appropriates $25,000,000 out of money that is not in sight. We had a deficit in the revenue last month of $12,000,000, and the deficit is likely to be a great deal more than that at the end of the year. But even if we had the money, I think it would be simply throwing it away to deal it out under the provisions of this bill.

We have expended in our State altogether some $125,000,000 in recent years in State, county, and town in the construction of highways, and we have spent the most of it to good advantage.

It is true that in the last three years there has been some graft, amounting to $5,000,000 or $6,000,000. That perhaps does not count in the present administration of affairs, under which our State has been laboring for three years. It is a small percentage on the $125,000,000. A good deal of it has been spent to good account. But, Mr. Chairman, it costs from $6,000 to $12,000 a mile to build a good road in our State. We have been spending that money for the trunk lines. The automobile has created a great deal of interest in the construction of roads, and it is most destructive to good roads. We have found that we have had to spend about as much more money per mile in from three to five years in repairing the good roads that we have already built. We have had some good results by county and town cooperation in good roads. When we got the proper sort of a man to give his personal attention to it, even the old turnpike, such as they used to build, has been improved upon, and it answers very well if you can keep the automobile off from it, and the farmers now have a good deal better show to get to market. I do not know but $60 a mile would amount to perhaps one-hundredth part of what these good highways cost, and might be a drop in the bucket, but it would be a mere drop. I understand the object of this bill is to create an interest where there is no interest in roads, and I understand that a great part of the country has little or no interest in roads, but they want to get in and ride the National Government to build highways. They are always willing to do something at the expense of the National Government.

I remember when we had irrigation before the House they were to spend in each State in irrigating an amount equal to the amount that accrued from the sale of Uncle Sam's lands within the boundaries of that State. If we adopted that rule, New York could get quite a sum out of this bill. Instead of a million and three-quarters we would get some seven or eight millions. That would help a little in the construction of our highways, but it would be only a drop in the bucket. We are not asking the country at large to build our roads or to do things for us. When we want a highway we build it. We commenced nearly 100 years ago with the Erie Canal, and we have spent $200,000,000 on it. You may say, "You spent it for yourselves." No; we did not. Every farm that can get its produce to the Great Lakes system of waterways is benefited by our Erie Canal in the way of reduced freights and has been for years past. [Applause.] You say, "We are spending money to improve your rivers and harbors." Well, you are spending very little in New York compared with its immense commerce. Take the Hudson River, with more commerce than any other river in the United States for the same length, how little you spend upon that. If you will give us the rivers and harbors in the State of New York, and keep out of them and let us have them, we will pay you back all the money you put into them, and we will go on at our expense and improve these rivers and harbors and we will save money by it, because we will get good rivers and harbors then instead of dividing up the money among the congressional districts. That sort of legislation is the vice of this bill. Gentlemen think because they will get a few paltry dollars for their districts that it is going to help somebody in the next election, and there are so many people in Congress who are hanging on by the gills that, of course, it is no use to talk against such a bill as this. It is breath uselessly wasted; it is time spent in vain. I know how you will vote. I will not say that these words of mine are like casting pearls, or anything of that kind, because that would be a reflection upon the House or upon some individual.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose so. I have only five minutes. I understand that there are very few of us who are opposed to this sort of thing.

Mr. FESS. I understand the gentleman to suggest that we are voting for this bill because it will assist us in our election. I wish to inform the gentleman that my district went against the Ohio good-roads proposition last year two votes to one.

Mr. PAYNE. I think, then, if $50 or $60 a mile, spent on any of the roads in that district, will help to create some enthusiasm there for good roads, perhaps it may do good in that district. [Applause.] It may help to educate the people in that district, and the Lord knows they need education if, in this enlightened day, they are voting against the good-roads proposition.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman does not want all my time. I will yield again for a question.

Mr. FESS. The district in which I live may need education, but we have seven colleges in that district.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman does not ask any question. He simply states a proposition and interrupts. I think that is hardly fair, when I have only five minutes in which to talk about this great question. There is no doubt that it is a great question in this country. It will do the people an immense amount of good to have good roads. I am in favor of good roads. I should like to see some sensible way of getting them.

We have come to the conclusion in our State that we can not make roads that will not need repairing, replacing, and rebuilding, at a cost equal to the first expense, in five years, and we have got to cover them with brick or some other hard substance that the automobiles can not break up and that heavy loads with narrow tires can not break up, in order to have a durable road. How many of them are you going to build with a contribution of $60 a mile or $15 a mile, or any such sum as that? Of course, the proposition is preposterous. Why, you have spread this thing out so thin that the design of it is too apparent to every man in the district. When they see that you are putting into roads $60 a mile, they will say, "How many votes are you going to get on that mile of road with that $60?" [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I do not like graft. I do not like to accuse anybody of graft. It is not graft. I know how people are led into it. They want to come back here, and they want to do things that are popular. Why, we have never been able to break up this appropriation for seeds, because gentlemen thought it helped to elect them. I have always voted against it, and I have gone into my district and told them so; and some of my colleagues here have asked me how I dared oppose the appropriation for seeds when people wanted them. I told them I hoped there was not a voter in the district who could be bought with 10 cents' worth of seeds. I told the people in the district that, and they thought that was right. They do not like this petty graft. They do not like this petty sort of business. If we are going to build roads, let us build roads. Let us face the proposition. If we spend $125,000,000 in New York and we have not yet got the roads, but have only got fairly started, how many billions are you going to spend in the United States? Face the music. Face the proposition, and do not begin with a $25,000,000 appropriation from a bankrupt Treasury.

A revenue law! A revenue law that does not produce revenue, which is the usual sort of a Democratic revenue law. There was a Wilson bill of 1894, and now we have the Wilson bill of 1913, all operating in the same direction. Oh, but they say they are going to make it up out of the income tax. Under the law of 1909 we were getting more than half as much as you expect to get under the income tax, and you have simply continued that tax on corporations as a part of your income tax.

Gentlemen, have a care. Listen to what my colleague the gentleman from New York, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, says about your voting these enormous expenditures. In addition to having a deficit in the Treasury do you want to make it heavier? In addition to a deficit in the revenue do you want to extend it by voting larger appropriations? How are you coming out at the end of the year? Have a care, gentlemen, $50 or $60 a mile may not compensate for the deficiency you will have for the present year. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not know why the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] or any of us on this side need be disturbed with regard to the sources of income for these proposed expenditures. We are not responsible for the condition of the Treasury. If there should be a shortage, it can not be charged to us.

Mr. Chairman, when the proposition contained in section 4 of this bill was before the House some time ago I voted against it. I have always had very serious doubts as to the advisability of the Federal Government going into the work of constructing or helping to construct roads in the States. I have very serious doubts in regard to the matter now; but I am convinced that, no matter what I or other gentlemen think about it, the people of the country have made up their minds that they are going to have more aid than they have had hitherto from the Federal Government in the matter of internal improvements. Many think that the people want us to build railroads in Alaska, and will so vote. Larger appropriations for rivers and harbors and for the Mississippi River, not only in the interest of navigation but for the protection of the lands along that stream, will be asked and granted.

The sooner we face squarely that feature of the proposition as regards the Mississippi the better it will be for our consciences if not for the Treasury. I am inclined to think that we ought to do these things for the valley of the Mississippi.

Whether we deem it wise or not, the people are going to insist that the Federal Government shall in some way or other assist the people of the States in the construction of highways. I am going to vote for this bill, amended as I hope it will be, with some mental reservation, in view of my belief that the people generally demand legislation along the line of Federal aid in road building.

I have no doubt that the bill is faulty in some of its details, and if it has such faults as have been pointed out by the gentleman from Illinois and others, I think those faults can and should be remedied. It seems to me, however, that we must put some faith in the honesty and integrity of the State officials in whose hands the money is to be placed. It would not take long to remedy the situation if in any given instance it was discovered that the moneys were not being used and expended for the purpose contemplated.

I think, however, the bill ought to be amended in some respects, to which I wish to call attention in addition to the possible need of amendments that have been suggested by others. At the proper time I shall propose an amendment, beginning on line 9, page 1, and extending to line 6, page 2, inserting in lieu of the language stricken out the following:

One-third in the proportion which the total population of such State bears to the total population of all of the States; one-third in the proportion which the total number of miles of rural post roads in use in such State bears to the total number of miles of rural post roads in use in all of the States; and one-third in the proportion which the total area of such State bears to the total area of all of the States.

This is the paragraph that fixes the basis on which the moneys are to be apportioned. The bill now provides that the money is to be apportioned one-half on population and one-half the length of the rural mail routes. My proposition is one-third in proportion to population, one-third in proportion to miles of post roads, and one-third in proportion to the relation that the total area of each State bears to the total area of all the States in the Union.

An amendment of that sort will give some of the States having very difficult road problems at least a sum sufficient to make a beginning. If the gentlemen will read the estimated apportionment under the bill as it now stands as given by the committee in its report, they will notice how utterly inadequate and ridiculous is the sum that some great Commonwealths would receive under the bill unless it is amended.

I shall also propose an amendment after the paragraph ending on line 9, page 4. This paragraph, which the proposed amendment follows, is the paragraph that provides that the States shall pay half of the expenditure. My amendment is as follows:

Provided, That States having within their borders public lands, reserved or unreserved and untaxed, shall only be required to pay such proportion of one-half of the cost of construction as the lands in private ownership in such States, and taxable, bears to the total area of the State, and the remainder shall be paid by the United States.

There are States in the Union in which only 20 to 25 per cent of the lands are in private ownership, where the citizens of the State must build roads over mountain ranges and country of difficult construction and secure the funds for such construction by the taxation of less than 20 per cent of the area. There are roads in my State, many miles in length, that pass over public lands almost exclusively.

If one will note how little the great public-land States would secure under this bill, he will understand the propriety, the necessity, and the justice of some such amendment as I have suggested. We should not be required to pay for the construction of the roads over and adjacent to the lands which we can not tax. When the National Government is proposing to assist in road construction, the General Government, which is proprietor of these lands, should, it seems to me, bear its fair proportion of the amount required. I shall propose these two amendments at the proper time, and I hope that they will be adopted. If they are adopted, it will greatly benefit States like California, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Arizona, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, Washington, Wyoming; to a lesser extent States like Arkansas, North Dakota, Wisconsin, and Minnesota; and to a still smaller extent a number of States that I have not mentioned. The effect of the last amendment I have suggested would be to increase the amount which my State would receive—about $35,000—and even then we would receive of the $25,000,000 proposed to be appropriated less than $80,000 to be expended in an area of nearly 90,000 square miles, containing several mountain ranges, over which our roads must be built.

The first amendment I have proposed is one that would give us the amount of the appropriation which the great extent of the Western States entitles them to, and would increase by a large sum the amount due a State such as I have the honor to represent here. If both amendments were adopted we would be in position to build our needed roads rapidly.

It will be necessary to amend the bill in some such way as I have suggested, if in its operation it is to be at all fair to any of the great public-land States, and even as thus amended it will not put the mountain States on a parity with the other States of the Union, because of the very great cost of road construction in such States. It will at least put those States in much better position than they would be under the bill as it now stands.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to Mr. MONDELL to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANSBERRY].

[Mr. ANSBERRY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, when the resolution came to the Rules Committee for the establishment of a roads committee, I remember that I took the opportunity to state that I believed that proposal was in contradiction of the fundamental principle of the Democratic Party; that such internal improvements are beyond the scope of the Federal Government and should be made by the States. Objection was taken to that statement by a number of Democrats, but I believe all will admit that there is in this proposal an instance of the contradictory principles of the party at the present time. The Democratic Party in its history has shown that it is opposed to a system of internal improvements by Federal authority, and that it believes in the National Government keeping its hands off every effort of a similar nature. The Republican Party might fundamentally be in favor of this proposal, and yet that grand old party leader, that grand old man from the New York State [Mr. PAYNE], has taken the floor this afternoon and has bitterly opposed this proposition. It seems to me the people of this country have a right to demand a consistent policy from their political parties. They have a right to say that parties shall be built on principles instead of on interests. When the Democratic Party is divided on the fundamental idea of this proposal; when the Republican Party is divided on it, it looks to me as though the people might well refuse to follow such leadership. Parties have been in favor of it, in their platforms, from expediency, but at the present time there is a sharp division between party members. The Progressive Party has taken a stand on this proposition as a part of its fundamental principle that this Nation is an entity, not a group of sovereign States, and that the Federal power is the agency of all the people to be used in promoting the common welfare.

Therefore the Progressive Party can rest on a fundamental principle and say that it favors national authority over the highways of the Nation. Good roads are necessary for the common welfare, as every one has admitted in this debate. There are two and a quarter million miles of roads in this country, and only 10 per cent of that number is improved. The cost of transporting a ton of freight over them is 23 cents a mile, according to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART]. I have figures that it costs the average farmer of this country on an average load of a ton over an average haul of 12 miles $3, which is a little more than 23 cents a ton-mile. It has been proven that that cost can be cut down from $3 to $1 by improving the roads of this country. That would mean a saving of $375,000,000 on the 250,000,000 tons of farm products that are hauled over the roads every year. That means a saving of at least $20 for every family in the entire Nation, a clear saving in the cost of living of $4 for every man, woman, and child by an improved system of good roads. So the good-roads question enters into the great problem that is before the Nation, a problem that is greater than any issue, and that is how the average man can make his income equal his expenditures for the necessaries of life, with the very best possible margin left for his improvement and culture and development. The proposal in this bill to improve roads by Federal aid is good, without doubt, but it seems to me that the bill introduced in the House by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF], House bill 10401, would much better meet the public will. The principle of that bill is that the Post Office Department should have charge of this, with rural mail carriers made the inspectors of the roads and commissioned to report as to their construction and maintenance.

Mr. Chairman, any plan adopted should be simple and practicable. It should be such as will induce the local authorities to assist in construction and maintenance and it should provide for an equitable apportionment of funds among the States. These requirements are met by the Woodruff bill to a much greater degree than this measure under consideration. I hope that the features of the Woodruff bill may be incorporated into this legislation, and I shall take pleasure in supporting amendments with that end in view.

If that can not be done at this time, this bill should receive hearty support, for its purpose is right and its tendency is right. It means improved roads for the Nation, and, as Emerson says in his essay on "Civilization":

> When the Indian trail is widened, graded, and bridged to a good road, there is a benefactor, there is a missionary, a pacificator, a wealth bringer, a maker of markets, and a vent for industry.

Good roads may, perhaps, be a benefit to the farmer primarily, but anything that benefits the farmer in this country benefits everybody. I believe that I can voice the sentiment of the overwhelming majority of the people of my district, one of the great centers of population, when I say that they favor a system of good roads throughout the country. The tremendous tonnage of the Pittsburgh district—168,000,000 tons a year—is larger than that of any other four ports in the world. It is largely traffic over railway and waterway, but the people there know that there is another highway of commerce just as important as either, and that is the roadway. They favor any just step which will bring the necessaries of life to the consumer from the producer, with the least possible expense and with every unnecessary burden removed. Good roads will help to do that in a very large degree, and for that reason this measure is commendable and worthy of support.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT].

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, this bill, in all its complications, brings up the question of what are proper subjects for Federal expenditure and for what purposes we should raise Federal revenue. One party comes in promising economy in Federal expenditure; another party comes in with a similar appeal; meanwhile we have decided that we ought not to extort by an oppressive tariff or other indirect methods of taxation burdens which, levied by the Federal Government, shall be heedlessly disbursed. We believe in leaving a man's earnings in his own pocket, except as the National Government and the national defense shall call upon him for contribution; for other contributions his State or its suborganizations should make the charge. We all believe in good roads and know the economic benefit accruing from easier hauling, and therefore from cheapened distribution, but whether this bill provides a sane, coherent system of road building and as to whether road building should be initiated by the Federal Government, these are questions to be considered here and now.

Under private tenure of land good roads primarily mean the enhancement of land values. Everyone knows that whenever anyone plans a subdivision and puts in street improvements he does it with the object of raising the price of the land and of making a profit not only on the land but upon the improvements. Such improvements are frankly for his personal profit and not for the public welfare. In the same way most of the money that the Federal Government might expend for good roads under this bill would inevitably go to the benefit of the landowner. It may be well to benefit the landowner; it is doubtless a good thing to cheapen hauls; but, in my opinion, we ought to go carefully and slowly and determine whether or not this vast expenditure will not inevitably become vaster and vaster as time goes on; whether, once started, it will not be a perennial grab bag, an increasing pressure on candidates for office. There is no end to the ultimate amount of it, and we should be more than careful to determine when and how or if at any time we should aid any State, county, city, or town in conjunction with private interests to assist in road building. We should carefully consider whether Federal aid should be extended to regions where the Federal Government is the chief landowner, as in the State of Wyoming, and in such event should pay the Federal portion, just as we should require the individual landowner under private ownership to pay his portion.

We are brought to a consideration whether under our ideas of municipal charters and municipal home rule and under county charters and under our doctrine of State rights such a bill as is proposed is more than a cheap waste of public funds, a negation of corporate self-respect. It seems to me that this money thus to be appropriated will be wasted, will be thrown in the air and allowed to blow where it will, will be sown broadcast in scatteration and inefficiency, to the disgrace of Congress and all of its Members.

In one way the bill is better than the bill which was introduced in the last Congress. It provides two alternatives—one that there must be the cooperation of the States; and then, in section 4, we find that cooperation is not essential; and we also find that an appropriation may be made out of the Federal Treasury and not necessarily expended at all. It is a frank case of local graft, a proposition to hand over to local authorities a Federal subsidy without any certainty that the money will be properly applied, and with the absolute assurance that the amounts are utterly inadequate to the alleged purposes for which they should be applied, without sufficient reference to the question of who owns the lands, who is the real beneficiary, or as to the jurisdiction under and by whom the money shall be spent for road purposes.

To my mind this bill will furnish a supreme test of the courage of the House. We all know that the hope of this bundle of financial chaos and indiscriminate subsidy for unorganized mud and dust rests in the breasts of Congressmen who look for reelection to the thoughtless among their constituents. It is not a good-roads bill; it is a bill for Federal subsidy to private and local interests.

It is a pork-barrel bill, pure and simple, promising limitless areas of future bacon. No man can vote for it without a vision of an adversary who will outpromise him, and so on till the receivership of the Republic.

I hope when the time of test comes that the Sixty-third Congress will prove itself braver than the Sixty-second Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe this bill is any particular test of courage. I think it is rather a test of common sense. [Applause.] If there is one question before the whole country to-day that is of huge public interest, it is that the country have good roads. [Applause.]

Now, it seems to me that this bill, in giving the option to the States as to the method in which this proposed appropriation shall be expended, is very wise. If you should talk in our State of Pennsylvania about spending $15 or $20 a mile on the roads, it would be considered impractical nonsense. For four years I tried to get the State commissioner of highways there to adopt a brick road. Finally we persuaded him to build a short section of that kind of road, and it has been so thoroughly tested out that now there is a very large sentiment in favor of brick roads, which cost anywhere from $12,000 to $20,000, perhaps, per mile.

This bill, as I understand it, avoids all questions of sectionalism. There is no room for questions of States' rights or Federal control, as has been suggested. The Federal Government admittedly has the constitutional right to carry the mail, and this implies, of course, the right to build post roads, and the plan of joint expenditures by State and Federal Government is plain business common sense. That would be one of the first things a business man would suggest. The Government can, under section 3 of the bill, make this expenditure in concert with the State authorities. Up in Pennsylvania, I understand, we would get about $1,500,000 out of this appropriation, which would not be required to be expended, under section 4 of the bill, at the rate of a few dollars per mile, but the engineers of Pennsylvania and of the Agricultural Department could get together and adopt a plan of improvement of roads, and expend that money in whatever way they wished, either for the improvement of the dirt roads or by building brick or macadam roads. This could be done at the option of the State under section 3.

Now, in my opinion, the improvement of the dirt roads—the township roads—is of far more importance than the building of great boulevard turnpikes, and the improvement of the dirt roads, where a small sum of money—$15, $20, or $30 per mile—expended by the Government, the State expending an equal amount, would improve those roads greatly.

And I do wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that, having studied the bill H. R. 10404, introduced by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF], I think the method advanced there of improving the dirt roads is really a great improvement over the bill introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD]. It seems to me so thoroughly well thought out, and meets so many of the objections that have been presented here as to the operation under section 4, that I believe it would be preferable.

Mr. SAUNDERS. May I interrupt my friend? That very system that you refer to could be put in operation in the State of Michigan under section 3 of this bill.

Mr. HULINGS. I was going to say that under the laws of some of the States that could be done, and I am satisfied that section of this bill could in some places be put into operation with many of the advantages of the Woodruff bill; and I am sorry that this House does not have the privilege of considering a bill that meets all the objections raised here, and which is of itself a fine tribute to the intelligence and the broad mind of its author, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF]. But I am in favor of this bill, Mr. Chairman, not because I think it is the very best bill that could be devised, but for the reason that it is a step in the right direction, and especially because under section 3 there can be such joint effort between the State and Federal authorities as to the kind of road and the manner of building as they in their joint wisdom may decide.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DERSHEM].

Mr. DERSHEM. Mr. Chairman, if there is one subject that we should be more interested in than another, it certainly is good roads, and I believe that nearly everyone is interested in this matter. Until recently, probably ten or twelve years ago, roads were built by the townships and counties in Pennsylvania, but a few here and there were at one time constructed and maintained by the State. However, most of the supervision and building of the roads in Pennsylvania was left to the townships and counties, with the result that very little, if any, improvement in methods of road building was made for many years.

The State highway department of Pennsylvania was established in 1903 by an act of the general assembly approved April 15, which was reenacted, with amendments, by an act approved May 1, 1905, which authorized the department to cooperate with the several counties and townships, and with boroughs in certain instances, in the improvement of public highways and the maintenance of improved highways, and provided for the application to the department of counties and townships for State aid in highway improvement and maintenance, and also provided for the payment of the cost of highway improvements made under the provisions of the act by the State, the counties, and townships. Further amendments were made by an act approved June 8, 1907. These acts and amendments were repealed and the department reorganized by the act approved May 31, 1911, which act authorizes a system of State highways to be constructed and maintained at the sole expense of the Commonwealth, and also a system of State-aid highways, in the construction of which the State cooperates with the counties and townships, and in certain instances with boroughs, the State paying fifty per centum and the county and township twenty-five per centum of the cost. The State will maintain all State-aid roads and collect fifty per centum of the cost thereof from the respective township or borough in which the road may lie.

This plan embraces about 8,000 miles of roads in Pennsylvania, which are to be constructed and maintained entirely at the expense of the State, and it has been said that the cost would be about $150,000,000 when the 8,000 miles of roads are completed.

The State has taken over a large portion of these 8,000 miles of roads, and is now maintaining them, but the money has not been provided for their improvement, as had been anticipated.

An amendment was proposed to the constitution, providing that the State borrow $50,000,000 for the building and maintaining of permanent roads. This was defeated at the last general election, not because the people did not believe that this plan was feasible or because they did not want good roads in Pennsylvania, but because they were opposed to the State going into debt, and for various other reasons, which I need not mention here, the amendment was defeated.

Now, I am heartily in favor of the Shackleford bill, not because of the financial assistance it will give to Pennsylvania in the building of roads, but because of the encouragement that it will give to the good people looking toward the betterment of their public roads.

I would like to say the master of our State grange, Hon. William T. Creasy, is strongly in favor of this bill. The Pennsylvania department of agriculture has gone on record as favoring it by passing resolutions, a copy of which have been forwarded to me, together with a letter, signed by N. B. Critchfield, Secretary State Board of Agriculture, which are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Harrisburg, Pa., February 2, 1914.

Hon. FRANK L. DERSHEM,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Inclosed find copy of preamble and resolutions passed by the Pennsylvania State Board of Agriculture, in annual session in this city January 28–30, which is self-explanatory.

Anything that you will be able to do to assist this proposed legislation will meet the approval of this board and, I believe, the approval of the agricultural interests of this State.

Very truly, yours,

N. B. CRITCHFIELD,
Secretary State Board of Agriculture.

The following preambles and resolutions were adopted by the Pennsylvania State Board of Agriculture, at its regular annual session held at Harrisburg, Pa., January 28–30, 1914:

Whereas Pennsylvania, at the last election, clearly demonstrated that she believes in a system of business roads leading from the farm to the market town, railroad station, school, and church on the "pay-as-you-go" plan; and

Whereas a bill now in Congress, known as the Shackleford road measure, provides aid for the various States for the improvement of roads by granting $60 per mile for macadam, $30 per mile for gravel, and $15 per mile for earth roads, yielding annually over $1,000,000 as Pennsylvania's share: Therefore,

Resolved, That we urge that each individual Congressman and Senator representing the Keystone State support by their vote the passage of the Shackleford road bill.

Resolved further, That we indorse the action of Congressman DERSHEM and others in the loyal support they are giving the measure in their Committee on Public Roads.

Resolved, That the secretary be directed to forward copy of these resolutions to the Members of each House of Congress from Pennsylvania.

In the latter part of the fourth section of the Shackleford bill you will find this provision:

That such payments of money made by the United States as hereinbefore provided shall, during the ensuing year, be applied to the construction, maintenance, or extension of the respective roads for which paid, and that in addition thereto the State or civil subdivisions thereof shall, during said ensuing fiscal year, expend in the construction, maintenance, or extension of said roads an amount equal to the amount so paid by the United States.

My understanding is that, by this provision, a township, borough, county, or the State will receive national aid for the maintenance and improvement of roads or streets by complying with certain conditions, thereby giving us better roads without additional cost to the local community.

The vast possibilities in the development of good dirt roads traversing the rural districts, an important factor in our rational scheme of development, are virtually neglected. It is vital that, while search is being made for a durable type of expensive construction, experts should learn how to maintain economically the dirt roads, which must carry a traffic as important to the public as that of the main arteries of travel.

Gradually there has been an awakening, not only to the need of good roads in this country, but also to the fact that millions of dollars are being wasted every year in having untrained men direct the work of highway improvement. We are coming to understand that dependence upon scientific principles is as necessary in the construction of even our earth roads as in the construction of the great bridges, buildings, and machinery which mark the progress of our civilization and prosperity.

We know that a good surface is not the only requirement for a good road; and, furthermore, in this country macadam roads, although common, constitute less than three per centum of the total road mileage, owing to the comparatively high cost of construction. Until recently a road appeared to be a very common, ordinary kind of structure, and not worthy of much forethought and experience in its design, either as to grades and alignment or to drainage and surfacing, but to-day good road building is a science.

There are over 2,000,000 miles of unimproved roads in this country. It can not be expected that the United States Government will itself undertake the immediate improvement of all these roads, but it is certain that the Government must lead the way. The expenditures necessary to improve all these roads will be enormous, and therefore it would be the work of the Government highway engineers and scientists not only to direct the improvement of a certain proportion of these roads, but also to devise methods of building highways more economically and with better surfaces for the future to an ever-increasing degree, so that the farmer may have easy communication between the farms on one hand and the towns and railway stations on the other, that he may market his crops at less expense, and the dweller in the towns and cities may get from the farm products more easily and at less cost. For this reason, if for no other, a general system of roads radiating from the towns and railway stations out among the farms would be of advantage to all.

Mr. KENT, Mr. GOOD, Mr. HULINGS, and Mr. WEAVER, by unanimous consent, were granted leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the first place, I wish to say that in my judgment the people of the United States who are interested in good roads owe a debt of gratitude to the chairman of this committee [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] for his untiring efforts to bring about this legislation. [Applause.]

There is no doubt but that this bill is somewhat crude, and probably contains some inconsistencies, and that it will perhaps be difficult to administer and perhaps will result in some mistakes of administration. But the subject of good roads is a great subject, and to write a law on the subject that would be perfect is, I think, beyond the power of any man in this Congress. I want to say frankly that I attempted, with my feeble ability, to draft a good-roads bill and I soon found that it was a most difficult task, and one which I gave up, at least for the present.

I am in favor of legislation of this character, and my principal reason for favoring such legislation is the fact that the Federal Government is reaching out and usurping all the fields that are possible from which to gather revenue. Not being content with levying duties upon imports and collecting such money as might be raised from internal revenue, the Federal Government has proceeded to levy taxes upon the corporations of the country, and now we have an income tax, and I presume the next thing will be an inheritance tax. It is very evident that the Federal Government is making an attempt to gather all the money that is possible from taxation into the Federal Treasury, and in my judgment, in justice to the taxpaying public of the respective States of this Union, the people are entitled to a return of a portion of that money, that will be expended in such a way as will result in benefit to the people of the respective States. [Applause.]

Unless this is done, unless we get some of the money back with which to construct highways and other things that are essential for the welfare of the people of the States, and unless the money gathered here is to be expended on other objects than increasing the military strength of the country, increasing our Navy, and increasing the number of officeholders and squandered in that way, leaving the burden entirely upon the shoulders of the people to pay the money that is raised by direct taxation upon their visible and tangible property, the time will soon come in this country when the burden of taxation will be so great that revolution will be the ultimate end of the matter.

But if the Federal Government will treat the States justly and the people from whom they collect this money with equity and justice, so that the people derive some benefit from it, I am satisfied it will meet with general approval.

This money that is going back, as I suggested to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]—this money that is gathered in the Treasury and sent out to the respective States to be expended on the highways—is their own money. They have put it into the Treasury, and why should they not have a part of it expended in their interests and for their welfare?

I think, Mr. Chairman, that is all I have to say at this time.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FRANCIS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FRANCIS] is recognized.

Mr. FRANCIS. Mr. Chairman, it would be futile to undertake to discuss a momentous question like this in the short period of time that is allotted to me; but I want to say this: That we have here a bill which seeks in an equitable manner to distribute to the 48 States of the Union a part of the revenues of this Nation, which will do more good to more people than any other expenditure of money attempted by this Government. [Applause.]

Our State of Ohio has taken the most advanced grounds for the improvement of highways of any State in the Union, and great credit is due to our good-roads associations, State administration, and the press, and especially to that excellent publication, Better Roads, edited by Mr. Jesse Taylor, of Jamestown, Ohio, which has done so much to pull Ohio out of the mud.

We have already provided for the construction of good roads. We have authorized the levy of one-half mill on every dollar, to be expended in the construction of market roads, and have raised an annual fund of about $3,500,000. The amount which this bill will give to the State of Ohio is $1,295,000. Our State has therefore practically provided for its public highways; but I feel an interest not only in the highways of the State of Ohio, but in the establishment of a uniform system of highways for all the States of this Union. [Applause.]

This bill proposes to extend Federal aid to each of the States of this Union in the building and maintenance of public post roads. We have built roads in our Territorial possessions, Alaska, the Canal Zone, Porto Rico, and the Philippines, and we have now come to the conclusion that we should benefit the people at home by extending aid to the roads which are being used and established by the Postal Department of our Government in the carrying of rural mails; and we all agree that this will have a direct effect to benefit the farmer and rural communities, by improving their condition and agricultural advantages and by advancing the interest of the church and the school, upon which so much in our Republic depends, in preparing and fitting post roads for the delivery of packages and parcels, and in the dissemination of knowledge to the farming and rural communities by the delivery of rural mails.

The unanimity with which this bill is received by the House, by all political parties, seems to me more of a ratification meeting upon this subject than anything else. The people from every corner of the United States have been urging and advocating a system of good roads. We have over 5,000 good-roads associations in advocacy of the principles we stand for, and there seems to be no contention as to the benefits which will be derived from them; and there is no longer any contention as to the Government's right under the post-roads clause of the Constitution, to construct or maintain them.

We are following the express terms of the Democratic platform as adopted in its last two national conventions, where we declare in favor of extending Government aid to the States for good roads.

The enthusiasts for good roads have been advocating three principles for their construction. The first, and what I would call the most reasonable, is to extend Federal aid to the roads used for the carriage and transportation of United States mails, namely, rural routes; the second, is to extend Federal aid to the construction and maintenance of roads radiating out from a common center, to be known as market roads; and the third, is that advocating a system of roads of principal thoroughfares, or roads leading from ocean to ocean.

When we carefully consider this bill, its terms ought to satisfy any enthusiast on any of these propositions, so far as his theory is practical.

This bill provides for the expenditure in any one year not to exceed $25,000,000 for the construction and maintenance of post roads, and it expressly provides an equitable manner of distributing this, which shall be calculated from two very reasonable bases. The first is half the sum of money that any such State receives from the Government shall be computed in the relation its population bears to the whole population of the United States; and the other half shall be computed from the relation the miles of rural roads in any such State shall bear to the whole number of miles of rural roads in the United States. These, added together, shall constitute the amount that any State shall receive under this plan in any year.

Section 3 provides, among other things, that this sum may be expended in a half-and-half plan; the State to which it is given shall contribute at least, and have ready for its use, half of the money to be expended in this way upon its highways; but this expenditure shall be limited to rural-route roads, and this money, or any part of it, at the option of any State, may be expended under the provisions of section 4, which defines the different classes of roads and fixes a standard for their construction and provides a payment of a certain amount for each class at the end of each year, providing they have been kept up to that standard.

When we consider the amount which may be thus paid to each State, it is easy to see that it will amount to about the sum that each State would pay into the United States Treasury by direct and indirect taxation and that we are giving them out of the United States Treasury nothing more than they are supplying to it; and therefore this bill, when analyzed to its finality, has no more effect than to systematize and standardize the post roads of the United States and to induce and compel a construction by a uniform system.

It occurs to me that this bill should be amended in one particular. Last year when the good-roads bill came up for consideration in the House there was a great question which committee of the House had authority to report the bill, and it was brought upon the floor by a special rule. The Agricultural Committee assumed to have this authority, and to avoid any further contention in the present Congress and in order to satisfy the great demand for road legislation we deemed it necessary to formulate a committee known as a Committee on National Highways.

In reporting this bill the committee has based its authority on the post-roads clause of the Constitution, and are extending the aid to post roads alone; but instead of controlling the same within the Postal Department of the Government this bill gives the Agricultural Department the whole supervision of the system.

Now, if this is a matter solely within the Agricultural Department, surely the Agricultural Committee would have been the proper committee to retain and report such bills; but I think it is very patent to anyone here that inasmuch as the whole authority is derived from the post-roads clause of the Constitution, and that the roads to be aided, improved, and maintained in order to facilitate the Postal Service is additional cause why the Post Office Department should make and manage such roads. From this it follows that surely the Postmaster General should have the authority to control the detail work required under this bill and to control the expenditures of this money, and I think the bill should be amended so as to conform to this idea.

As I have shown that in the working of this bill it gives nothing to the States that the States have not already contributed to the General Government. I think it will occur to everyone here that some direct means other than those already known should be devised for the raising of funds for the construction and maintenance of post roads, for their maintenance and upkeep is a more serious and important question than their construction. Every public expenditure of the Government is upon the theory that the public receives in return some benefit, directly or indirectly, in proportion to the amount contributed, and on this theory the present bill has more direct benefits to the people than any other that could be proposed.

We are just now considering the advisability of the Government taking over and operating the telegraph and telephone companies of this country, and it has been demonstrated that it would be impractical to take either one of these without taking the other, because they are used jointly and their wires are performing the same service; that while we are using the long-distance telephone there may be transmitted a telegram over the same wire at the same time; and therefore if we should take over the one we would be obliged to take over the other also. These corporate privileges have been extended to telegraph and telephone companies by the State governments, and the effect of them has been to purloin from the Postal System in an indirect way almost all the advantages it had in the matter of carrying the lighter mails; that is, letters conveying information. These companies perform exactly the same service as does the post office in the carrying of intelligence and information from one person to another. This has been practically the cause of driving the post office into the carrying of heavier matters so that it might subsist, while the cream of its business has been absorbed by the telegraph and the telephone; for every telephone message is simply a 2-cent stamp exacted from the Government, because the communication would have been transmitted by mail were it not for this new and more improved service. We have therefore licensed by corporate charter a system which has had the direct effect to undermine the Postal System at the expense of the public. This is something that the people should own and have the full enjoyment of.

I see no reason why these great rural post roads of our country and our post offices should not be made a means of conveying this information by telegraph and telephone, so that the people might get the full benefits of what is justly due them. The highways will be a right of way for the lines and our post offices for the operators. The profits arising from them, at a fair charge, would build and improve all the highways in the country required by this bill. It would give rural communities the advantage of the cheap service, and every farmer, mechanic, and laboring man in the United States could have a telephone at a nominal cost, and the cry of "back to the farm" would lose its empty sound and an inducement be held out for man to return to that industrial sphere for which he was created, "to till the soil."

We have just passed in Congress the Smith-Lever agricultural extension bill, aiding States in establishing and maintaining agricultural colleges for the advancement of the farmers' interests.

We are now considering the enactment of a rural credit system whereby our agriculturists and small home owners may be permitted to borrow money at the lowest possible rate of interest and without exaction. These are matters which have been urged by many of our agricultural societies, granges, and farmers' unions, and we can see in this the hope for the future prosperity of our Republic.

Our great cities are incidents of the greatness of our agricultural resources only. Our gold mines furnish a medium of exchange for these products. Factories change these products of the field and forest for the comfort of man. Our railroads and other transportation companies carry the products from the farm to the factory and back to the people; but back of all this progress and prosperity stand the broad acres of 48 States of the Union, and the sheaf of wheat, shock of corn, and bale of cotton are the fountain sources of our national prosperity and wealth.

Good roads will reduce the cost of transportation on the highways from 28 cents per ton per mile to 8 cents, will add untold wealth to farm values and facilitate the transportation of the farmer's products, and result in the dual benefit to the producer and the consumer, the farm and factory. The interest of the farmer, miner, and manufacturer are interdependent. The laborer, in whatever capacity, will be benefited by the enactment of this law.

Do you want to assist our farmers and rural communities to educate their children? Then remove that lake of mud which lies in the children's road between their homes and the schoolhouse. Do you want to assist our rural churches? Then take a few millions from battleships and in the interest of "peace on earth, good will toward man" give it to the farmer's road, so that his family can have a pleasant Sunday morning's ride to church instead of wading through the mud.

Do you want again to see the cattle upon a thousand hills, plains, and vales, and the grain waving in the summer sun? Then aid the farmer in better roads and he will again take his place in the field—back to the farm—and rise up and call this Congress blessed.

Owing to the wretched condition of some of our country roads there are women and children who are veritable prisoners in their country homes, mud bound for months at a time. Is it any wonder that they desire a change from this situation and seek the conveniences of city life?

We are glad to see that a ray of hope for them is seen in the present Congress, and that the rural mail routes will be improved so as to develop civic pride throughout the Union.

The heavy burdened rural carriers and star-route carriers must have roads brought up to such degree of perfection as will meet the requirements of the great service they are performing. We have by legislative enactment changed their work from mail carrier to mail and freight carrier without increasing their compensation to meet this increased burden which we have put upon them. We must help them in this matter to better pay on a scientific basis and by building roads which will not be a disgrace to the Postal Service and to our country, for, in the language of the poet philosopher—

A fierce and bitter storm's abroad; it is a bleak, midwinter day, and slowly o'er the frozen sod the postman's pony picks its way. The postman and his horse are cold, but fearlessly they face the gale; though storms increase a hundredfold, the farmer folk must have their mail. The hours drag on, the lonely road grows rougher with each mile that's past, the weary pony feels its load, and staggers in the shrieking blast. But man and horse strive on the more; they never learned such word as fail; though tempests beat and torrents pour, the farmer folk must have their mail. At night the pony, to its shed, drags on its cold, exhausted frame; and after supper to his bed the wearied postman does the same. To-morrow brings the same old round, the same exhausting, thankless grind; the journey over frozen ground, the facing of the bitter wind. The postman does a hero's stunt to earn his scanty roll of kale; of all the storms he bears the brunt—the farmer folk must have their mail.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

[Mr. FOWLER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to see that some gentlemen who favor this bill are frank enough to advocate it as a scheme for the distribution of the public revenue in their districts. In fact, this scheme of appropriating $35,000,000 for Federal aid to roads in all parts of the country is one of the most preposterous schemes for looting the Treasury of the United States ever devised. It out-porks any pork-barrel proposition ever before propounded, and its possibilities of future pork are limitless. How many miles of roads have we in this country? Something like three or four billion miles. That is the chief reason why almost everybody is for it, an incidental reason being the strong advocacy of certain manufacturing and contracting interests. Gentlemen say this bill is in the interest of the farmers. Of course it is, if the farmers do not mind being robbed of a few millions more than the benefits can possibly amount to. I have heard gentlemen argue with every appearance of entire sincerity that a boulevard from Montreal to Miami would be in the interest of the farmers, and that an asphalt road from New York to San Francisco, which could be built at some such trifling cost as a couple of hundred million dollars, would be in the interest of the farmers. I suppose that now and then a farmer could be found bold enough to venture on such a road after having taken out a special accident policy.

Mr. Chairman, there has been more "bunk" uttered on the floor of this House for home consumption "in the interest of the farmer" and more humbug advocated "in the interest of the farmers" than there have been crimes committed in the name of liberty, and that is perhaps one of the chief reasons why farming has ceased to be a highly profitable industry.

Of course gentlemen will say, and have said, that this bill is not a scheme for building asphalt pavements or macadam roads exclusively. It is ostensibly a plan to help the construction of post roads—roads over which the rural-delivery carriers have to travel. In my opinion, if a portion of the money were appropriated for justly earned increases in the compensation of the rural carriers, they would get over the roads all right.

To carry and deliver the mail is a function of the Federal Government—

Says the report of the committee which has this bill in charge—and it is the duty of the Federal Government to provide itself with the facilities necessary to a proper performance of this function, such as postmasters, post offices, and post roads.

Quite so. And our Democratic friends are now endeavoring, with a good deal of heartburn, to provide the postmasters. That sentence in the report furnishes the clew to the whole scheme. Not everybody can be appointed postmaster, but nearly every locality can get a little slice of this $35,000,000; and what an army of inspectors will be required for the purpose of finding out whether the roads are up to the standard! How many disappointed post-office aspirants can be taken care of in this way!

Mr. Chairman, I shall be accused of being in opposition to this so-called "good-roads" proposition because I represent a district in the State of New York. Well, I think that would be sufficient reason for opposing it if there were not other better reasons. New York has one-tenth of the population of the whole country, and will receive about one-twentieth of this fund. New York pays about one-third of all the Federal taxes of this country, something like two hundred million and odd dollars, and will receive under this bill the paltry sum of $1,700,000. New York has good roads now and is entirely capable of taking care of them without asking any alms of the Federal Government.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] in answering a question has compared the building of roads by the Government to the dredging of the Ambrose Channel in New York Harbor. It has been pointed out by my colleague [Mr. PARKER] that the States control the roads and that the Government controls the harbor, and it has also been said by my colleague [Mr. PAYNE] that if New York is given full control of New York Harbor and its revenues it will do its own dredging and pay back to the United States every cent ever expended on its harbors or rivers for the past century inside of a single year.

Mr. SAUNDERS. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. SAUNDERS. What revenue does the Federal Government get from New York Harbor or the Ambrose Channel?

Mr. PLATT. It gets several hundred million dollars revenue collected at the port of New York.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That revenue could be collected elsewhere. New York does not pay that revenue.

Mr. PLATT. If the vessels could be induced to enter some other harbor, the revenue could be collected elsewhere.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is entirely unnecessary, because the people everywhere are awake to the advantages of good roads and need no help. If the National Government wants to raise the standard of post roads, it has only to insist upon better roads as a condition precedent to the establishment of rural or star routes and the response will be immediate.

Mr. Chairman, I agree with some of the others who have spoken, that the bill introduced by my friend the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] is fairer and safeguards better the distribution of the pork than this bill, but I see no necessity for distributing any pork. If the States can not take care of their own roads without help and dictation by the Federal Government, the time is pretty nearly at hand for the abolition of the State governments as useless and expensive encumbrances on the taxpayers. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I believe that whatever provision this bill makes for State aid it should provide for the turning over of the revenues and having them expended, under Government supervision, through the regular organizations of the State. I believe it would be a mistake for the National Government to undertake to take over the control of these roads, for the reason that should the Government fail to make appropriations the local organizations which had learned to depend on the Government would be left helpless, without funds for maintenance.

The maintenance of these roads is more important and difficult, in fact, than the securing of funds to construct them in the first place. The old National Pike is an example of the neglect of the Government to maintain a road after it had constructed it. As soon as the Government ceased to make appropriations for that purpose the States permitted this great highway to go into decay. It seems to me it is absolutely important that the local road organizations keep full control of these roads and of this fund and that the work be done under Government supervision.

I am heartily in favor of the provision in this bill for aid to dirt roads, because I believe that in the Western States, where the territory is extensive and the population sparse, it will be impossible to secure permanent highways, and the small appropriation that the Government will make for the purpose of encouraging these local organizations in maintaining these roads will be an immense stimulation to them for that purpose.

It seems scarcely necessary any longer to make an argument in favor of permanent wagon roads. We have passed that stage of the subject, and the only question now is to agree upon the method of construction and maintenance. The question is, Shall the local road organizations bear the whole burden, or shall the State and Nation lend a helping hand? The public highways belong to the people—all the people—but as a matter of fact they have generally been paid for by the landowners living contiguous to them. There is no good reason why the burden of constructing and maintaining a public highway should fall wholly upon the people living within its immediate neighborhood. All the people are directly or indirectly benefited by the road. The State should pay a large part of the road tax by way of State aid to counties, and counties, in turn, should either take over the roads and maintain them or employ a road engineer to supervise their maintenance through local road districts of the county.

The States should aid counties, for the reason that the large corporate industries of the State that live directly off of the products of the farm should bear their share of this burden. The great railroads, packing companies, grain companies, and so forth, of the State of Nebraska all deal almost exclusively in farm products, and at the present time they bear little of the burden of maintaining public highways. It would be a good investment for them to have better wagon roads, and they know this and are ready to pay their share of the taxes. The farmer has not generally favored State aid to counties because he has not quite understood it. He has felt it meant more taxes for him to pay, when, as a matter of fact, it means that a portion of the burden the farmer now bears will be shifted to the corporations, that now pay little, if any, road tax.

The National Government should aid the States in road building and maintenance, because there are hundreds of thousands of people who are directly benefited by good public roads who have no opportunity under our present system of taxation to contribute to them. But when the Government aids the States for this purpose every man pays his small share to the support of the roads of the country over which his foodstuffs are now moved. In fact, his road tax may turn out to be an investment instead of a tax, because the cost of marketing will undoubtedly be decreased, and as the cost of marketing is decreased production will be stimulated, and in the end the small tax paid by the individual indirectly in the form of tariffs may reasonably be expected to be offset by the decreased cost of marketing and increased production.

The National Government has given many millions of dollars to cheapen water transportation by improving rivers and harbors. It has given hundreds of millions of acres of public domain to aid in building railroads, all in the interest of cheaper transportation. The last big project, the Panama Canal, costing $400,000,000, is about completed. Congress was right in doing for the commerce of the Nation what individual enterprise could not do, and when it takes up the matter of Government aid to States for good roads it will have taken a step it should have taken long ago.

The Alaskan railroad may be and probably is an undertaking for the National Government, but I submit that to appropriate $40,000,000 to build a railroad in frozen Alaska for the benefit of fifty or sixty thousand people before we give aid to a hundred million people at home is not good practice. We have built permanent roads for the barefoot peoples of our island possessions, a canal for all the world, and now propose a $40,000,000 railroad for Alaska. The first two projects I had no opportunity to vote upon, but the Alaskan project will certainly not get my support at the expense of the good-roads bill. This Shackleford road bill provides for $25,000,000 to be expended for the benefit of a hundred million people. The Alaskan project calls for $40,000,000 to be expended in building a railroad in a land that has been frozen 200 feet deep since the dawn of time, and only about 60,000 people, half white, living in it. It may be worth the investment, but I am insisting upon the needs of the people who pay the taxes being attended to first, then if we can develop Alaska profitably no one should object.

It is true that the small sum that the National Government appropriates to the States will not go far in itself to build roads, but will do wonders in stimulating the States to action, and as the States act they in turn will stimulate the smaller subdivisions, so when the money appropriated by the National Government finally gets down to the road district it will have grown to be a tremendous amount in the aggregate for the whole United States. It will be the first step toward a perfect system of roadways throughout the farming centers of the United States, and with these roadways will go better schools, better churches, higher grade of citizenship, and greater food production. In fact, good roads are inseparable from a high order of citizenship. A country without good roads is invariably barbaric. Which is the cause and which the effect I do not know, but history proves that they always go together.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JACOWAY].

[Mr. JACOWAY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, under the provisions of this bill Federal aid in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads is to be extended to the States and their civil subdivisions. We on this side of the Chamber who champion its passage are not unmindful of the fact that this is a reversal of the policy of the Democratic Party. The immortal founders of that great party opposed Federal aid for internal improvements. Parties, however, like people, change with changing conditions. The Federal Government has constantly widened the field from which it gathers its revenues until literally it may be said that a taxgatherer now stands at every man's door, and the people demand that some returns be made to all the people for these vast revenues collected. Commerce and manufacture have for more than a century received benefits from the Public Treasury in the way of aids in transportation, and the farmer, who has been a liberal producer, should share at last in the benefits. The Federal Government should not extend its aid to the people engaged in trade, manufacture, and mining and deny equal opportunities, aid, and assistance to those engaged in agriculture.

You who oppose the bill have assigned many reasons for your opposition, but in fact only three have been advanced that challenge serious consideration. First, you deny that the General Government under the Constitution has the authority to make the appropriations. The answer seems obvious and clear. Section 8 of Article I of the Constitution grants to the Government the power to establish post offices and post roads, and with that grant unquestionably goes the power to appropriate money for that purpose, and this we take is an expressed warrant for our advocacy of this measure.

The second objection, that it is unjust to a part of the citizens, namely, those who reside in cities and larger towns, and who, by the expressed terms of this bill, are prohibited from participating directly in its benefits, are unjustly dealt with; that this is class legislation. If this charge be true, the bill is indefensible, because every citizen of this great Republic, rich or poor, white or black, is entitled to exact justice. He should not be compelled to bear burdens for others. No tax should be laid upon him simply that a revenue might be produced to favor other classes. No one admits this more readily than I.

Briefly, let us examine the facts to see if this charge is well founded. For a hundred years appropriations have been made from time to time from the general revenues to improve the navigation of rivers and for the construction and maintenance of harbors along the lakes and sea, in aid of commerce and trade, so that people engaged in manufacture and trade might have a cheap and secure method of transporting their goods and wares from the initial points to the place of consumption. The beneficiaries of this have justified the Government's action by saying whatever adds to the general prosperity of the country benefits all the people thereof. We have accepted in good faith these declarations, and no one has seriously complained that the Government has extended this aid. From time to time discriminations have been made in favor of American shipping, in order to encourage the building of ships by our people, and to induce them to engage in trade and commerce across the seas. Under the same theory that it adds to the general wealth of the people, grants of millions of acres of lands and millions of dollars of public money have been made to railroads to induce their construction and operation so that commerce and development might be carried on in all parts of the Union. Certainly the farmer enjoys least of any the benefits to flow from this policy, because in a peculiar way his transactions are local and his trade confined to a narrow circle. Now, for the first time in the history of this country some substantial recognition is taken of the peculiar problems that are his, and governmental aid is proposed to be extended him hereunder that has been due him, but long delayed. Why, it has been asserted here on the floor of the House during the discussion of this bill, and not denied, that the cost of moving a ton of produce over the ordinary country roads is 30 cents a mile, and that with improved highways this cost would be reduced to less than 10 cents a mile.

In other words, more than two-thirds of the cost of marketing the products of the farm and the forest can be lifted from the shoulders of the farmers by the improvement of country roads. Certainly no other appropriation, for any purpose whatever, has carried such great benefits in proportion to the amount of money actually required to make the improvements. Nor will this benefit be entirely his own. If it would, it might be unfair to extend it, however great the necessity, because it would be unjust to tax all the people that a benefit might be conferred upon any particular class or portion of the people.

And, as said before, the people of the cities and larger towns are expressly precluded from any direct participation in the benefits of this measure, but indirectly they certainly will receive benefits from this appropriation, because the people of the cities and towns are dependent upon the farmer for whatever they eat and wear; and, therefore, whatever cheapens the cost of production or transportation of these necessities of life will necessarily be shared in by the people who consume the articles produced or transported. Without question one of the causes of the high cost of living, of which we now hear so constantly and so much, is due to this very problem of transporting the products of the farm to the communities that consume them. Therefore, is it not apparent that the charge of injustice and discrimination lodged against the measure is without foundation, and that this is not class legislation?

The third objection, and, in my judgment, the most serious one, is as to the best method of extending aid, granted the Government has the authority and owes the obligation so to do. The greatest criticism has been leveled against this feature of the measure, and the greatest criticisms of all have been aimed against sections 3 and 4 of the bill. One gentleman, in giving notice of his intention to seek to amend these sections, and especially section 3, said that States like his own State of Kentucky, that had no State authority for dealing with highways, but left each county to pursue whatever policy it might choose, would be denied any help under the bill, unless the counties or civil subdivisions of the State might be granted the power to deal directly with the Federal Government. If that contention is true, the measure should be defeated, because I take it that no one who loves his State and believes that the States are independent sovereigns, as I do, can ever consent that the General Government shall be granted the power to go within the State and deal with lesser subdivisions thereof. To concede the Federal Government this right would be to legislate the States out of existence. It would be a surrender of the last vestige of the right of the State, a deathblow to its sovereignty. I shall never accede to this doctrine, and if Federal aid to public highways must come only by the surrender of this right, I prefer to have no Federal aid for this cause whatever. But, in my judgment, a careful reading of these sections, especially section 3, will show that no such condition or necessity can arise. To me it seems perfectly apparent that the provisions therein contained make it plain that the State may act for any subdivision and secure for the subdivision that part of the appropriation to which it might be entitled under the provisions of this bill.

Of course I realize, and I hardly think anyone else entertains a different opinion, that no State—and I know this is true as to my own State—will be able to procure the maximum amount authorized under this provision immediately. In fact, the bill intends to promote the construction and maintenance of good roads, not alone by Federal assistance and Federal construction, but by stimulating the localities to be benefited to act in their own behalf and to urge the States themselves to put forth greater activity in order that larger and ever-increasing contributions may be obtained from the Federal Government. This is both just and wise, for if all its benefits might be derived by a State, or the subdivisions thereof, without making any effort upon its part, the result would be perhaps a tendency toward inaction and neglect upon the part of the State, and finally the Government would become the sole contributor toward the construction and maintenance of public highways. Many have expressed the belief that the Government should take over the highway system of the country, ignoring the States; that the Federal Government should be the owner and operator of all the highways. No greater misfortune, I think, could ever occur, and I oppose it, and shall continue to do so. I commend this bill especially, and the chairman of the committee that drafted it, for leaving with the States all the right and authority over their highways. I am willing that my own people, and shall insist that people of other communities, shall bear a part of the expense and enjoy the full control of this great blessing, and the framers of this measure have wisely so constructed it to stimulate the localities in building and caring for their own roads.

Another feature that strongly commends the measure to me is the fact that under its terms Federal aid will not be extended in the construction of one or two interstate highways useful principally to the owners of automobiles and to tourists, but of practically no value to the people of the State. On the other hand, it looks to the improvement of local roads; to the building and maintenance of highways that are actually used by the farmer in reaching his market with his produce. It seeks to build up in every section of the country practical roads for the people of that particular locality, and while the amount appropriated is not large, nor all of that will be available under the present condition of our roads, yet it is a sufficient fund to encourage permanent road building, and I hope within a few years it will be followed by larger appropriations for this purpose.

The maximum amount under this bill that my home State could receive would be $388,750 annually, or a little over $5,000 for each county therein. Under the present development of our roads that it would receive even a half of this amount is hardly to be expected. I do believe, however, that, stimulated by its provisions, in a short time we would be entitled to enjoy the maximum benefits of the bill. I think the measure should appeal to the sense of fairness, the love of right, and the desire to be of assistance, of every Member of the House. I shall vote for it, and trust it will pass.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BALTZ].

Mr. BALTZ. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss for a few minutes the question of good roads which is proposed in House bill 11686 and which is now before this House, and which I think is of great importance to the well-being of the people of our whole country. This important subject needs no argument, as it is self-evident. It is the universal demand of the people of this country that the Federal Government give aid for the building and maintenance of good roads.

Federal aid for good roads in the various States of the Union is directly in line with the policies recently inaugurated by Congress and the administration. In my opinion, nothing will tend to the betterment of conditions, especially in agricultural communities, as much as improved highways. It is needless here to recount the advantages which will accrue from the enactment of this bill. The efforts already put forth by the States themselves in this direction are living evidences of the benefits derived, and with Federal aid these benefits will be doubled. I believe the people have the right to expect that the Federal Government will assist in movements such as this, which are of nation-wide importance and which virtually have taken on the dignity and the scope of interstate movements. Nothing of recent times has so impressed itself upon the favor of the people, and one of the great departments of the Government has investigated the subject from every standpoint, and by voice and pen has urged the construction of these highways and encouraged the people to believe at least by implication that the Congress took an active interest in the movement. Such being the case, I am surprised that any opposition whatever should show itself to this bill. The measure is drawn on correct lines. It shows no favoritism to any State, and is just in every particular.

The hand of the National Government thus extended to its people is an encouragement to greater patriotism and greater effort on their part. The knowledge that our Government stands behind us in all good works and is willing to see that our efforts are furthered and assisted will cause us to realize that to be an American means something and that behind that term stands a tremendous force willing not only to accept our aid and our strength but to lend to us its help in all good works.

I have heard it intimated here that this bill is in the nature of "a pork barrel." It is no statesmanship which creates such a charge nor is it patriotism which sounds it. Were this measure to be defeated on this indictment, what then would become of our public-building policy or our river and harbor improvement? Any law making appropriations for the country at large or for certain sections of the country has been subject to this criticism and probably always will be, but not from the fair and open minded. There have been abuses to some extent in these bills in the past; there will probably be some in the future, because favoritism and political expedience will in rare instances overbalance the judgment of those who have in charge these measures. But the general results attained have added not a little to our prosperity and our growth, and most of the appropriations extended have been born of necessity and relieved situations which justified them.

The measure now under consideration and for the enactment of which I appeal, is not one which will justify suspicion in any regard. It is so drawn that no favoritism can be shown so far as the Government is concerned. If abuses grow from it, those who abuse it will be answerable to their State governments, not to us; therefore I favor this bill. I hope and believe it will pass this House with little opposition, and I believe its enactment will benefit the people of this country more than any like measure ever written on the statute book. This measure has my hearty support, and I shall vote for it in the consciousness that my action will meet with the approval of my constituency. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK].

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I am in hearty sympathy with the Shackleford good-roads bill and support it with great satisfaction. My vote for the Sherwood pension bill and the vote I expect to cast for the Shackleford good-roads bill will be the two votes of which I will be most proud as a Member of this body.

Mr. Chairman, I have long been an advocate of good roads. I am not a recent convert. My record on this question is well-known in my district, and especially in my home county. I have the good fortune to be possessed of a farm back in Ohio, and I am glad to say it is the farm upon which I was born, and still more pleased to say the farm upon which my father was born and has always resided upon. I want to give notice now that I expect to absent myself to attend the ninetieth birthday celebration of my good old father on that old Buckeye farm on the 19th day of this month. [Applause.] I am now paying special assessments on my farm for three pikes, which I gave my best influence to secure. I pay these taxes cheerfully, because I am a believer in good roads and am willing to help pay the freight.

Ohio is giving much attention to the building of pikes and the improvement of the highways. Some portions of the State are now practically all piked. This bill, in my opinion, will be a great incentive to not only the people of my State, but to every other State. It is what the people have been demanding for years, and the people are at last getting recognition. Why this Government can appropriate thirty to forty million dollars annually for rivers and harbors, as it has been doing for many years, and then deny Federal aid for post roads on the grounds that it is unconstitutional I could never understand. If we have the right under our Constitution to appropriate for one purpose, then we have the right to appropriate for the other. The same argument is as good for one as it is for the other. More than 75 Members have already spoken in favor of this bill during this general debate, and I am glad to say none of the constitutional experts have so far raised their voices in opposition on that ground. The light is breaking in at last.

This bill provides:

That the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, may aid the States and the civil subdivisions thereof, in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads in an amount not exceeding $25,000,000 in any fiscal year; that the portion thereof which may be expended in any State in any fiscal year shall be determined upon the following basis, to wit: One-half in the proportion which the total population of such State bears to the total population of all of the States, as shown by the next preceding Federal census; and one-half in the proportion which the total number of miles of rural post roads in use in such State bears to the total number of miles of rural post roads in use in all of the States, as shown by the report of the Postmaster General at the close of the second quarter of the last preceding fiscal year.

Upon this basis Ohio will receive as its share of this appropriation $1,295,000. Ohio has 2,538 rural routes, with an average length of 23.80 miles, or an aggregate length of 60,406 miles. In addition there are 171 star routes, with an average length of 6.76 miles, or a total of 1,155 miles. The grand total is therefore 61,561 miles traversed by the rural and star routes in Ohio.

In all of the States there were in operation on December 1, 1913, 42,961 rural routes, with an aggregate length of 1,042,477 miles, or an average length of 24.27 miles for each route. At the same time there were 12,257 star routes, with an aggregate length of 156,477 miles, an average of 12.76 miles for each star route.

The estimated number of miles of highways in the United States is 2,250,000 miles, of which 416,888 miles are used as post roads. This bill divides these post roads into three classes, to wit:

Class A. All waterbound macadam roads or roads with a more expensive of more durable surface, 52,585 miles.

Class B. All roads built of gravel, shell, or proper combination of sand and clay, 161,790 miles.

Class C. All improved earth roads with adequate side drains, compacted, with crown smooth surface and well maintained, 222,513 miles.

Class A will be entitled under this bill to $60 per mile per annum, class B to $30 per mile, and class C to $15 per mile. Objection has been made to this bill because the best improved roads are to receive the most money. I believe the bill is right. The people who have expended the most to improve their highways should receive more encouragement than the less improved roads. Federal aid along this line will be an incentive to build more of class A roads.

Mr. Chairman, this is legislation in the interest of the class who contribute more to the support and prosperity of our country than any other class and have received less—the farmer. Of the billion or more dollars appropriated annually by Congress very little of it filters back to the farmer. The establishment of rural delivery of mail I admit was a great boon to the farmer. But the city folks had long enjoyed this service, so why should not the country folks have it? They have been simply placed on equality. Besides, the Postal Service is self-supporting; the people foot the bill for this service, and all should be treated alike.

Better road means cheaper transportation. Cheaper transportation means cheaper foodstuffs and living. The farmer feeds the people. What benefits the farmer benefits those who work in the factory, the shops, the thousands and tens of thousands who live in towns and cities. Why improve the rivers and harbors and not improve the great highways of the land over which must be transported the wheat, the corn, the cotton, the cattle and hogs, and every article we eat and wear? The Government collects its revenues from all of the people and all of the people should receive the same fair consideration and return.

I voted for the tariff bill last summer, although I was not in full sympathy with some of its provisions. I voted for it because it had more good in it than bad. I could not afford to vote against an income tax. That provision alone meant more to the people than any injustice that may have existed. I either had to swallow it whole or reject it. My opinion was then, and is now, that the farmer was discriminated against. The Shackleford bill will be simply giving the farmer his just dues and will square the account in very decent fashion.

Besides, Mr. Chairman, when we pass this bill we will simply be redeeming a party pledge made in the Baltimore platform. We declared in favor of "national aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads."

We have a President in the White House who proposes to see that the Democratic Party redeems all of its platform pledges. There is but one thing, therefore, for Congress to do, and that is to pass this bill. The only objection I have to the bill is that it does not carry a larger appropriation. But I content myself with it as a starter. My prediction is that to the end of time every future Congress will appropriate for good roads and the amount will grow larger and larger. France, England, and Germany and other nations are far in the lead in good road building. There is no question in this country in which the people are so generally concerned as the improvement of our highways. Why, then, should not this Government be required to pay something toward the maintenance of the roads used every day by the Postal Service and interstate commerce?

Mr. Chairman, before concluding I want to say "honor to whom honor is due." Who is entitled to more credit than any dozen Members of this Congress, yes, more possibly than all others combined for this $25,000,000 entering wedge of Federal aid for public highways—the chairman of the Committee on Roads, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD]. It took a Gen. SHERWOOD to get the pension bill through the Sixty-second Congress. It required a DORSEY W. SHACKLEFORD to get this good-roads bill so near a law. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] has long been the foremost advocate in Congress of this legislation. When the Committee on Roads was created at the beginning of this Congress, he voluntarily stepped out of the Ways and Means Committee with the full consciousness that in the Sixty-fourth Congress he was almost certain to become the chairman of the greatest of all committees—the Ways and Means Committee—and accepted the chairmanship of the new Committee on Roads with uncertain future. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] preferred to be a "dirt-roads statesman" and give his energies to good roads rather than be chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. Every farmer, every advocate of good roads in our land should tip their hats to "good old SHACK." for the splendid service he has given the American people.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat that I will vote for this bill with great satisfaction and will vote for legislation of this kind every time I have an opportunity, and the good people back in the seventeenth district of Ohio who are opposed to Federal aid for public highways should vote for some one besides me to represent them here. [Applause.]

I have just received the following telegram, which I will insert in the RECORD, and is further evidence that I voice the sentiments of the people of my State:

COLUMBUS, OHIO, February 7, 1914.

Congressman WILLIAM A. ASHBROOK,
Washington, D. C.:

Having considered the various road bills that have been introduced in Congress, we believe that the Shackleford bill is the best suited to present conditions, and would respectfully and most urgently request that you cast your vote for the Shackleford bill in the House without any amendment. In making this request we are confident that we speak authoritatively for each and every good-roads enthusiast in Ohio, nearly all of whom are members of this federation.

OHIO GOOD ROADS FEDERATION,
ARCHIBALD H. HUSTON, Secretary.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE].

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, judges have written in their decisions, statesmen have proclaimed in this forum, and economists have written in the books that the two great questions in government about which all others cluster are commerce and transportation. We are coming more and more to understand that rapid transportation is a necessity in our present development. One reason why this bill should be supported is that the expenditure is sure to bring quick and substantial returns upon the investment. One of the heaviest items of cost to the producer is charged to the marketing of a crop. Poor, undeveloped roads retard development of rural communities, depress profits not only of the products of the farm but of the farm itself. We do business profitably nowadays when the volume of production is large and exchanges quickly made.

The central West is beginning to realize the great importance of that statement. The last report made by the Secretary of Agriculture showed Indiana to be the third State in the Union, on a percentage basis, with improved highways. She was only led by Rhode Island, with 49.14 per cent, and Massachusetts, with 49 per cent of her highways improved, while Indiana had 36.7 per cent. Rhode Island only had 2,120 miles of public highways and Massachusetts 17,272 miles, while Indiana had 67,996 miles. She had 24,000 miles of improved highways—more than all the roads of the two States named, both improved and unimproved. We are just awakening to the necessity of good roads as an element in our industrial and State growth. In the district I represent, five years ago there were more than 1,700 miles of improved highways. In one county in my district there are now pending before the board of county commissioners 43 petitions praying for the right under the township road law to construct macadamized highways. I refer to this simply to show the interest taken in this important subject. All over the State there is great activity among the farmers in organizing to secure better highways. The direct result on the price of farm lands is shown from the fact that improved farms abutting on crushed-stone road have advanced in price from 25 to 40 per cent because of that fact alone. The bill ought to be supported for another reason. The improvement contemplated in this bill will enable the Postal Department to increase by at least 50 per cent the standard length of rural routes and permit the postal authorities to reduce the cost of the delivery of the mail at least 33 per cent because of the facility with which the mails can be delivered by the carrier to a larger patronage. The bill is right for another reason. It tends to produce a stronger and better social sentiment in the rural communities. It makes communication easier and tends to a better social status. Frequency of public gatherings fostered by a quick and comfortable assembling of the people is an auxiliary to a higher and better social condition.

There is an equitable proposition also involved in this bill in favor of its passage. It benefits the largest possible number of people directly. It is a matter of simple justice to the great interests of the country that for many years have willingly contributed to the improvement of coast cities and rivers and harbors. It is idle to say that the farm reaps an indirect benefit in the expenditure of such immense funds in the improvement of rivers and harbors and coast cities. Take the upper Mississippi Valley, the great bread and meat basket of this country, where 11 States, with more than 37,000,000 of people, produce 90 per cent of the food products for all the people. They do not complain of the taxation they have heretofore stood for that has been distributed in the border cities of the United States, but in return demand for that willing payment that they shall be permitted to expend a part of this taxation now in the interior of the country. There is another feature I call attention to. The postal business of the country is self-sustaining. The rural communities that contribute thereto ought not to be asked to go into their pockets to build the highways and keep them in repair for the Federal Government to transport the mails over without some compensation. Upon what basis can the Government justify the payment of immense sums to the railroads of the country for providing a way to get the mail to the cities and towns and then refuse to contribute to rural communities for performing the same service? The payment by the Federal Government of a small amount of the necessary cost in keeping improved highways in repair is money well expended. Under this bill, if it passes, Indiana will receive $1,016,250. There is no comparison, Mr. Chairman, between the benefits that the expenditure of $25,000,000 will produce when applied to the maintenance of a million miles of post roads as compared with the same amount invested in battleships. Considering the immense revenue that the Government now receives through all its sources of taxation, there ought to be no hesitation in expending the comparatively small amount indicated in this bill when the results will be so far-reaching and so beneficial. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY].

[Mr. LANGLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

[Mr. NORTON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to help enact this road bill, because I can hear in it the rattling of the bones of the old extreme State rights idea, with a chance of development along the line of a Federal Government that means something.

I am glad of our Union of States, and I do not want to destroy the sovereign rights of the States along some lines, but I have become so tired of the continued opposition of State-rights men to every proposition of advance that it pleases me to help enact legislation that throws the bright light of noonday athwart the "twilight zone."

I lived in Louisiana until 10 years ago, and, of course, have faith in the State establishment, and want to see our system preserved. But there is not now the same necessity for State jealousy that once prevailed. We have become one great country, one Nation, one people, involved alike in world problems and in great national undertakings.

When the Constitution was adopted the States were the real home of democracy. The people held their government in the States, or Colonies, in their own hands—offices and courts. No court under early State constitutions could, or, at least would, have been permitted to declare a statute unconstitutional. Legislative authority was supreme. In most of the States the judges were selected by the legislature. The right and procedure of removal of a judge was simple. So those States were jealous of their rights as separate Commonwealths.

A temporary union of the Colonies was brought about only as a military necessity during the Revolution. Federal Governments in that day were monarchical and absolute; democracy could be found only in local governments. These colonists had fled from that kind of government. They knew its rigor and its unjustice and inhumanity.

The framers of the Constitution had the job of their lives to put over a Federal Government as the Constitution provided. When they met to frame the great charter they went into executive session and the people were locked out. Members were not even permitted to copy any part of the proceedings. They had met ostensibly to amend the Articles of Confederation, but they took upon themselves the authority to present a complete Constitution. They made the Federal Government just as strong as they dared. They put no more of popular government in it than was necessary to make it pass the public scrutiny and secure adoption.

The Constitution was made almost impossible of amendment. The judiciary was given a power which enabled that arm of the Government later to assume the right to declare executive and legislative acts void. The Senate was placed as far from the reach of the people as possible, and an electoral college was provided to name the President. They had to put State rights into the proposition, however, or it would not pass. If they had been more liberal on democratic features, there would not have been so great necessity for States protecting their rights.

THE WHOLE PLAN NOW CHANGED.

But the whole plan is now changed, except as to the power of the judiciary, and the patriotism and good sense of the American people will soon solve that problem. The electoral college has been outlawed of its power by public opinion. The Senate is now elected by the people. We have learned how to amend the Constitution, but we will make that much more easy very soon.

The sovereign right of the Union was created by the judgment of the Civil War, not by the Constitution itself; although the framers of that instrument would have written it into the Constitution if they had not known that the people would not stand for it at that time.

Of course every patriotic citizen is glad the judgment of the Civil War was written as it was in this regard; and since the principles of democracy are being restored to our National Constitution, why hug so fast to the shores of the twilight zone? Let us sail some on the broad sea of Federal authority and power. The Senate no longer is the rich man's club. Senators must come before the people for their election. We will soon take from Federal judges their life tenure and require them to come before the people for approval or rejection every four or six years. We can trust the people of the whole Nation. We are one great family. We have got to stand or fall together. So I say I am glad of this bill because it rattles the bones of the old State-rights skeleton. Yes; let us have Federal aid for roads. We have lavishly expended our treasure for railroads to be owned and made a system of tolls by private corporations. Why not aid the ordinary public road, which no private greed can capitalize into profits?

I went to the memorable battle field of Gettysburg on the anniversary of that great battle last July by automobile in company with my colleague from the State of Washington [Mr. FALCONER], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS], and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DAVENPORT]. Every few miles, so long as we were in the State of Maryland, we were held up by some turnpike company to collect toll for the privilege of passing over the road. That I am glad to know is an exception to the rule. It is a pity that any American State will permit such a condition. I do not believe any aid should be given to any State in which the public does not own the highways of travel.

I long for the time when this Government will own all of the means of transportation in this country, the railroads and the roads, and the means of getting from place to place, and we will then be able to carry our mail and transport our people and freight on our own lines, and that will be a time when the Government will be able to do something that will be worth while along those lines.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. When that time arrives does the gentleman think a Member of Congress will have very much independence of action?

Mr. BRYAN. Some will and some will not. Some will be so afraid to move that they will not dare to speak up; but a man who stands for a substantial, definite, do-something kind of a government will then be able to speak and will not be ashamed of himself when he does speak.

Mr. McKENZIE. He probably would speak only once, would he not?

Mr. BRYAN. He would speak often enough. I know the gentleman himself would speak as often as he felt like speaking, and would say the right thing, too.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Under this bill the State of Washington will be entitled to receive $262,500. This is a very small sum when considered with relation to the sum necessary for road construction in my State. The voters of Washington will be called upon in the near future to vote at least $15,000,000 of bonds for roads. The State has an efficient highway commission and has been fortunate in having men who have made it their business to look after road construction and to create road sentiment at great personal expense and sacrifice. The people are awake to the situation, and we are building good permanent roads.

Mr. Samuel Hill has given hundreds of lectures, illustrated with lantern slides. His engagements have taken in legislatures in session, Young Men's Christian Association meetings, brotherhood dinners, commercial clubs, women's clubs, chambers of commerce, lodge meetings, street gatherings, and any and every place where he could find people gathered together. At his own expense he has traveled over the State time and again demonstrating by his splendid fund of information the benefit of good roads. He has views from all over the world which, taken with his own remarks and figures, furnish most convincing argument for taxes for roads—real permanent macadam roads.

Judge J. P. Ronold, of the superior bench at Seattle, has devoted much time to creating good-road sentiment. The Pacific highway has especially engrossed his attention. This road extends from British Columbia on the north, through Washington, Oregon, California, and to Tiajuana, Mexico, on the south. It will later be continued to Panama, if present plans are carried out. One can now travel north or south the entire length of this highway without asking questions as to the way to go. More than half of this highway is paved with some hard surface material. It is to be finished by 1915, and thus become the longest paved highway in the world. We have been having an annual good roads convention in the State of Washington, and it is gratifying to have some Federal aid. You can not frame a bill so the State of Washington will be cut out unless you cut all the other States out. We can and will come in on any plan.

Another citizen of the State of Washington who has devoted special time and attention to good roads is Mr. John P. Hartman, a leading attorney of Seattle. In a recent letter to me in reference to Federal legislation, Mr. Hartman said, in part, as follows:

> The whole trouble with the roads situation in the United States is that we have too much machinery. That is, too many people talking about it and too few building. In our own State we have lost years of valuable time because of the constant friction between the State and the county authorities. If we shall now introduce the Government into this, then we increase the friction and lessen the efficiency of any one of the several bodies. More than that, we would finally find that the Federal Government, right or wrong, must have its way.
> The only practical plan, as I view the situation, is one by which the Federal Government shall build its own roads. They should be the great trunk thoroughfares from ocean to ocean, and then let the State build the mid-thoroughfares and the counties the laterals. This scheme is embraced in both the Warburton and the Bourne plans. The Warburton, by the way, I think is the best plan that ever has been devised. Congressman Warburton and Senator Bourne have done themselves proud in this work. When I see a good plan I prefer to follow it rather than try to hew an uncertain way.
> Yours, truly,
> JOHN P. HARTMAN.

I have already inserted in the RECORD a letter from Hon. Ernest Lister, governor of Washington, on this subject.

I am quite sure the Government later will go further into the construction of roads and will be ready for such a comprehensive and far-reaching plan as is referred to by Mr. Hartman.

The plan under consideration, the Shackleford bill, is a splendid beginning, and I gladly support the bill. There are many features of House bill 10404, by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF], that commend themselves to me. That bill and the comprehensive plan it presents will force itself for future consideration when this matter comes up for subsequent legislation.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HUGHES].

Mr. HUGHES of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, in my first race for Congress I incorporated in my platform a good-roads plank, advocating national aid to State roads. I have advocated that proposition from that hour to the present, and I am heartily in favor of the present bill. I wish to say that the third congressional district of Georgia is represented by one of the most distinguished Members of this House, the brilliant young CRISP, of Georgia. Previous to the time when Georgia was redistricted I had the honor of representing the third congressional district. It was a great agricultural district, and I had been a warm advocate of good roads for many years. Consequently, I was exceedingly anxious that the 15 counties composing that district should inaugurate at the beginning a systematic, scientific plan of building public highways. Therefore I wrote a letter to each of the boards of roads and revenues in these counties and suggested they make a request of the Government for an expert to start them off in the proper economical construction of their roads.

For reasons sufficient unto themselves there were 14 of those boards who failed to make that request, but one county did, and that was the county of Sumter, in which Americus is located. The expert went down to meet those people and superintended for them the construction of a model road. They followed this scientific demonstration. What was the result? It was that that county inaugurated one of the best systems of roads in the State of Georgia, and as soon as those roads were completed there were seekers of rural homes throughout the county who purchased and located there. Land went up 33⅓ per cent in value, and that which benefited that county will benefit in the same proportion any other county in Georgia or any other county in any State in this Union.

There is a great interest in the effort to retain the boy on the farm. In my opinion, good roads is a potent factor to consummate that end. Good roads eliminate distance, they bring the country and the town in close contact, and, as has been stated on the floor of this House, good roads reduce by perhaps 300 per cent the cost to the farmer of moving his products to the markets.

I hope this bill will pass, thereby vastly benefiting transportation for the great producers of this Nation—the farmers.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I represent a district of rural constituency—farmers—a section of the country a part of which a few years ago was regarded as as poor a country as Alabama contained. These people, with the limited means they have had and the interest that they have taken in the improvement of their roads, with the tireless energy of the men who inhabit that mountain section of the State, have developed it until it begins to blossom as the rose, and there is no section of the country that is more interested in this question. I have collaborated with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], who has labored for years on this matter. I have worked in connection with gentlemen from my own State who were in the good-roads fight, and I believe that if this bill is passed, if we cut off a few million dollars from battleships and big navies and big armies and apply the money to the development of the roads of the country, we will convince any who are enemies of America that our people, by their system of good roads, can reach transportation lines in time to meet and defeat any enemy that may confront us; and as a precaution against war itself, against any menace that any country may bring to us as well as for the development of the country, I am in favor of this bill. The friends of a big Navy are constantly raising the cry "Beware of the Japs," and yet that little nation spent last year less than $50,000,000 on their Navy, while we spent nearly three times that amount.

I have no doubt but that honest gentlemen favor a big Navy for what seems patriotic reasons to them, yet it appears to me that if they will stop a moment to reason about the matter they will see that it would be far better to spend the $30,000,000 that two battleships will cost on the construction and improvement of our public roads.

The bill is so guarded that our local and State authorities will have the actual supervision of the construction and upkeep of our roads. This is as it should be. I would be unwilling to turn over to the General Government the absolute right to control the construction and improvement of the roads. The best feature of the bill is that which requires the Government to pay for the use of our roads by its star and rural-mail carriers. We pay the railroads for the use of their cars and their tracks over which the mails are transported; then, for the same reason, is it not right that we should pay our people for the use of the public roads over which these same mails are carried?

It would cost an enormous sum for the Government to undertake to build the million miles of roads over which rural mails are carried, but this appropriation of $25,000,000 will go a long way toward improving the roads that we have. The bill divides the roads into three classes—A, B, and C—according to their width, character of construction, and so forth, and requires the Government to pay the sums of $60, $30, and $15 per mile, respectively, for the use of these roads in the transportation of its mails.

The people in every county of my district have within the past few years devoted much attention to the improvement of their roads, and they have hundreds of miles even now that will fall in class C and some that will reach class B. When a road is placed in good condition an industrious farmer with a good pair of mules, a large plow, a split-log drag, and a few other tools can keep up 10 or 15 miles a year without hardly missing the time that he would lose. One of the best results of this bill will be that it will encourage our own people to improve their roads, so as to meet the requirements and get the benefits of this appropriation, and I confidently predict that if this bill passes and we continue the appropriation for 10 years, our whole country will be a network of splendid roads.

Good roads will mean more rural mail routes, and rural routes will mean more newspapers and periodicals for the people in the country districts, and a wider spread of education among them. The great automobile interests would like to divert Government aid from rural routes to great trans-State and transcontinental lines in order to foster and promote their selfish gains. I have consistently set my face against any such gigantic schemes, because if we enter upon the exploitation of such projects we will not have any money to spare to the roads that are traversed by the people in the rural districts. Two years ago, in a speech that I made on this floor in behalf of a similar bill, I also urged the adoption of a proposition for a parcel post that was in the Post Office appropriation bill, in which the good-roads bill was also embraced. A Democratic House passed that bill with both the good-roads and the parcel-post propositions in it, but a Republican Senate struck out the good-roads feature of the bill. Now, with both branches of Congress and the Chief Executive Democratic, I believe that it will fare much better. We have only tried the parcel post for one year, but it has proven a success far beyond the hopes of its most sanguine advocates, and I understand that it is much more than paying its way.

Many of the merchants of my district wrote me letters of protest against its passage, predicting all kinds of disaster to the country and small-town merchants on account of competition with the mail-order houses. I went on and supported it with speech and vote, and now these very merchants are loudest in their praise of the beneficent results of the parcel post. With the inauguration of the parcel post the loads of mail that have to be carried by our rural and star-route carriers have greatly increased, and with it has increased the importance to the Government of better public roads, and with that importance has increased the duty of the Government to aid in providing these improved roads.

For years I have labored in this good work, and I am delighted that the realization of our desires seems now in sight. I feel that my work and the work of Judge SHACKLEFORD, who has led this fight, will not be in vain. I here insert a letter from our leader, Judge SHACKLEFORD, as evidence of the part which it has been my privilege to take in this great movement:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON ROADS,
Washington, D. C., February 2, 1914.

Hon. JOHN L. BURNETT, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BURNETT: The Rules Committee has agreed to report a rule as soon as the immigration bill is disposed of by which it will be in order to take up the good-roads bill.

Knowing the great interest that you have always taken in legislation for the improvement of our public roads, I write to urge you to make a speech on the bill during the debate on the same.

I am sure the bill which we have reported from the committee will meet with your hearty approval, as it embraces all of the provisions which were contained in the excellent bill which you introduced in the last Congress.

Your friend, D. W. SHACKLEFORD.

This is a progressive administration, and the good-roads movement will no doubt receive an impetus at its hands. Our platform declares for it, the people demand it, and I hope the bill will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, may aid the States and the civil subdivisions thereof in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads in an amount not exceeding $25,000,000 in any fiscal year; that the portion thereof which may be expended in any State in any fiscal year shall be determined upon the following basis, to wit: One-half in the proportion which the total population of such State bears to the total population of all of the States, as shown by the next preceding Federal census; and one-half in the proportion which the total number of miles of rural post roads in use in such State bears to the total number of miles of rural post roads in use in all of the States, as shown by the report of the Postmaster General at the close of the second quarter of the last preceding fiscal year; that on or before the 20th day of January in each year the Secretary of Agriculture shall prepare and file in his office a statement showing the amount which under the provisions of this act may be expended in each State during the next fiscal year and the proportions thereof which may be expended under section 3 and section 4 of this act and transmit by registered mail a copy of such statement to the governor of each State on or before the 31st day of said January: Provided, That for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1914, the Secretary of Agriculture shall so prepare and file said statement and transmit copies thereof to the governors of the respective States within 60 days after the final passage of this act.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUBEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11686) to provide that the United States shall in certain cases aid the States and the civil subdivisions thereof in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER designated Mr. BARTLETT as Speaker pro tempore for Sunday, February 8, 1914.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if he intends to publish any pamphlets or addresses or articles by persons not Members of this House?

Mr. DONOVAN. It has not been before the House for action, has it?

Mr. RAKER. Not yet. Of course, it is one of those things we hope to get up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut objects.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD very briefly on a matter wholly nonpolitical.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate adjourn.

In compliance with the foregoing the Vice President appointed as said committee Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. VARDAMAN, Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. CLAPP, and Mr. STERLING.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 833. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 10084. An act to authorize the changing of the names of the steamships Buckman and Watson;

H. R. 9574. An act to authorize the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River near the city of Hannibal, in the State of Missouri; and

H. R. 9317. An act to regulate the payment of postal money orders.

RETURN OF BILL TO SENATE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following resolution from the Senate, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 3625) "to authorize the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River near the city of Hannibal, in the State of Missouri."

Mr. MANN. What is the request?

The SPEAKER. To return a bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River near the city of Hannibal, Mo.

Mr. MANN. To return it?

The SPEAKER. Yes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman who objected to my request to extend my remarks in the RECORD will withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the question of equal suffrage. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from California if he contemplates discussing the distinction between woman suffrage and equal suffrage in his remarks?

Mr. RAKER. Well, I have always stood, and stand now, for the question of equal suffrage, and if it applies to women, all right. Of course, I shall dwell quite extensively on the fact that women have rights and, therefore, should be treated equally with their brothers.

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman desires to insert an apology for the action of the Democratic caucus?

Mr. RAKER. Me? Never!

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not stand for the Democratic caucus?

Mr. RAKER. Not on that.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman desires to insert an apology for the Democratic caucus?

Mr. RAKER. No.

Mr. MANN. I was hoping he did. But if not, all right.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I believe, in all fairness to the gentleman from California, that any Member has a right to extend his remarks on any subject he may deem proper. This is a very important question to the gentleman from California and his people. Whatever the outcome of his efforts to get his resolution considered may have been, it would seem to me but fairness on the part of the House that he be permitted to extend his remarks. He says that they will include nothing in the way of pamphlets or extensive literature, and I hope there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Sunday, February 8, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, February 8, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by Mr. BARTLETT as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, let Thy spirit descend copiously upon us as we thus assemble in memory of the departed; men who by their nobility of character, intellectual attainments, and patriotic zeal won for themselves the confidence of their fellows who selected them to be their representatives in this body, to enact into law the things which make for good government; an honor which challenges the respect of men and has secured for them an enviable place in American history.

Their work is done; their souls have passed into the realm where character will be their passport into the larger fields of endeavor prepared by the Giver of all good gifts. We thank Thee for their lives, for their work, for their example. May we work and faint not, trust and doubt not, and be ready when the summons comes to pass on into the larger life, prepared for whatever awaits us; in the spirit of the Master. Amen.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the Journal of yesterday and that the same be approved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the Journal of yesterday and that the same be approved. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE RODDENBERY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the special order for to-day.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. PARK, by unanimous consent, Ordered, That Sunday, February 8, 1914, be set apart for addresses upon the life, character, and public services of the Hon. S. A. RODDENBERY, late a Representative from the State of Georgia.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution, which I send to the desk to be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia offers a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 407.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tribute to the memory of Hon. SEABORN ANDERSON RODDENBERY, late a Member of this House from the State of Georgia.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of the exercises of this day, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, "life is a dome of many-colored glass that dims the bright radiance of futurity until death crumbles it in fragments." It is then only we may hope to see clearly.

Twice within the last four years have Representatives of the second congressional district of Georgia been called from this House to the "house not made with hands"—James Matthew Griggs, of Dawson, genial, gifted, masterful, whose bright life, as a sun, set while it was yet day; SEABORN ANDERSON RODDENBERY, of Thomasville, earnest, tireless, forceful, now enshrined a martyr in the hearts of the people.

Within the past 12 months some score Members of this body have gone to the "great beyond," reminding us that life is uncertain, death is sure, and that we are soon to follow.

Some have gone the unknown way,
While some await the call to rest;
Who knoweth whether it is best
For those who went or those who stay?

The ceaseless clang of eternity's clock stroke is sounding the march of death, in whose unbroken line "soul touches soul; the muster roll of life eternal knows no gaps."

ANDERSON RODDENBERY, as he was known to his district, was born on his father's farm in Decatur County, Ga., on the 12th of January, 1870. He moved to Thomas County in his childhood.

His early days were spent alternately on the farm and in a country store at Cairo, Ga.

He received his education in the common schools and at Mercer University. In his young manhood he taught school, and in his spare time studied law.

For a period he held the chair of languages and mathematics at South Georgia College, where he performed excellent, lasting service.

In 1891 he was married to Miss Johnnie Butler, a member of the distinguished Butler family of Mitchell County, Ga. His married life was happy, made cheerful by his devoted wife, the mother of his two sons and three daughters; and this good woman, the greatest loser, is the chief mourner for him we commemorate to-day.

The people of Thomas County early recognized his fitness for leadership, and chose him, at the age of 21, their representative in the Georgia Legislature, where he served with distinction in the sessions of 1892 and 1893.

In 1894 he was admitted to the bar, and forced his way rapidly to the forefront by dint of brains and pluck.

For four years he was the honored judge of the county court of his county, after which his talents were engaged in practicing law and in farming.

For two terms he was mayor of Thomasville, standing squarely for clean government and honest enforcement of law, and he had it.

For four years he was president of the board of education of Thomas County, during which time education was given a great forward impetus.

On the 16th day of February, 1910, he was elected to the Sixty-first Congress to fill an unexpired term, and was a Member of this House when he died.

Those who served with him can best speak of his life and labors here; I tell of them as we of his district knew of them in southwestern Georgia.

His friend and pastor, Dr. J. M. Rushin, of Boston, Ga., baptized him at an early age and received him into the fellowship of his church.

He writes that—

As a boy he was exceptionally bright, lovable in his ways, a dutiful son, and universally popular with his comrades.

He developed into a brainy, forceful character, always on the right side of every moral question.

He further writes:

He was the friend and adviser of the poor, and only eternity will reveal his benefactions to that class.

To the struggling boy or girl who desired an education his means were largely employed. He was a friend that you could count on at all times and under all circumstances; he was bold and aggressive in his advocacy of what he conceived to be right, true and loyal to his friend and to the cause he espoused.

The same good man adds:

There is much I could say about my friend and brother, but perhaps this will suffice.

That brief description is complete; it is a perfect eulogy. I can add but little.

Mr. Speaker, I would prefer that praise by that good man to the thunderous applause of this House when filled with its Members.

That simple, truthful statement stands like living rock between the dead and any possible detraction forever.

Many saw but the surface; this Christian man looked deep into his soul and plainly spoke what he clearly saw without qualifying word or fulsome phrase; nor said he too much.

His guide in all things was "conscience, the incorruptible judge that sits in the secret chambers of every man's soul."

As a judge he tempered justice with mercy, and all the ends he aimed at were his country's, God's, and truth's.

He devoted his life to service, and, be it said to his honor, he labored to uplift humanity.

He believed that in the moral order men should live without hindering the lives of others, should live to aid others in attaining more complete life, and that a day will come when the individual will be blessed in "hand and foot and soul four-square, fashioned without fault," fit closely into the moral order as the perfect ashlar.

He welcomed the Boys' Corn Club meetings as splendid opportunities for encouragement, praise, and hope for those whose hands will soon hold the helm of state and the great business of life.

For years he fought under the brave banner of State-wide prohibition and lived to see a near realization of victory, and with his great coworkers, Judge Covington, of Moultrie, and Judge Harrell, of Bainbridge, he turned the tide in favor of prohibition in his district; and to-day it stands a permanent sentiment writ in the hearts of the people and upon the statutes of his State.

The multitudes who thronged the streets and gathered at his grave paid loving tribute, as from all the district they came and lowered into his last resting place their beloved "Alexander H. Stephens, of the wiregrass country."

He was a prepared lawyer, a bold and skillful adversary, and at times his eloquent argument before court and jury flashed powerful and brilliant. Such was his reputation that when his name appeared on any docket opposing counsel knew that his client's cause demanded all his powers to meet a foeman, at all points, worthy of his steel.

In private life he was a loyal, devoted husband; a gentle, guiding father; a loving brother; a friend without guile; a fair and brave antagonist; a generous neighbor, respecting the rights of others.

As we of the second district viewed him in Washington, he was the sentinel on the watchtower of white supremacy in State and Nation; no menace to its integrity dare approach by stealth or boldness without meeting his ringing challenge.

In clarion tones he sounded protest to the boasted superiority of American civilization, which permits a legal conjunction of a paranoiac child of the civilized centuries with a dark denizen of that twilight zone which marks the moral boundaries between habitations of creatures in God's image and dens of the inarticulate anthropoid of the fierce, savage jungle.

Roused by his clear call, the Anglo-Saxon blood gave instant answer, through the quick sensibilities of the popular press, from Maine to Texas and from the Lakes to the Mexic Sea. And some day this great Congress will mold the die to stamp his true thought into law—in the judgment of many, the best for the future of all the races.

A soldier of Napoleon lay stricken on the field; a surgeon searched the ghastly wound above his heart, and as the probe went down the soldier said, "A little deeper, Doctor, you will find the emperor."

Thus with ANDERSON RODDENBERY, had you searched deep in his bosom you would have found the toiling masses.

He fought beyond his strength; he strove beyond his power; he lived and labored in hopes for them, and literally gave his life for them.

A stripling Ivanhoe, he entered here the lists, with bright lance poised, fluttering the penon of the people's rights; none dared to think that in his boyish form there throbbed a lion heart.

No Christian knight ever struck with less fear the shield of doughty foe with mortal point until it rang again or rushed to onset upon the plains of Ashby than RODDENBERY when he poised a logician's lance and charged for what he felt was right.

Recognizing the simple justice in pensions for destitute and invalid Union veterans who saw service his honest spirit indignant rose against the pension buccaneer who filches by circumstantial falsehood the sweat-soaked dollars of the masses covered into the Treasury by governmental fiat.

How his battling lance struck and struck again and shivered against the adamant of what he felt, and many feel, an unholy Gibraltar of pension fraud.

Too zealous some say who did not know the dauntless soul that knew the right and knowing dared maintain.

Too prodigal of strength some say to fight without hope but with undying faith in his cause; and, when weak with ceaseless fight, worsted by powerful odds, then burst his mighty heart and at the feet of all his country he fell down and spilled his life an incense, a free offering upon the altar of people's rights.

And in the end men will ask, not was the incense sweet, but was the altar pure.

I travel in thought with a noble writer who said:

It is not only in finished work that we should honor earnest effort. A spirit goes out of the man who means execution which outlives the most untimely ending. All who have meant good work with their whole hearts have done good work, although they die before they sign it.

Every heart that has beat strong and cheerfully has left a hopeful impulse in the world and bettered the tradition of mankind; and even if death catch people like a pitfall and in mid career, laying out vast projects, planning monstrous foundations flushed with hope, they should at once be tripped and silenced; is there not something brave and spirited in such a termination? And does not life go down with better grace, foaming in full body over a precipice?

When the Greeks made their fine saying that "Those whom the gods love die young." I can not but think they had this sort of death in mind; for surely at whatever age it overtake the man, this is to die young. Death has not taken so much as an illusion from his heart. In the hot-fit of life, a tiptoe on the highest point of being, he passes at a bound onto the other side.

This is but dim likeness of the man as he left it upon the hearts of his countrymen in the second district of Georgia. He sprung from the masses of the people and derived his patent of nobility direct from God.

The toiling multitudes believed in him; no man so humble or so poor that did not feel when he greeted RODDENBERY that he clasped the hand of help and sympathy.

He felt that the rich and powerful could care for themselves in the world's broad field of battle, and the poor needed help and encouragement.

At Thermopylæ stands a granite reminder of the devoted 300, bearing the inscription—

Go tell it, stranger, at Lacedæmon that we died here in obedience to her law.

So the shaft which the grand women of the second district of Georgia are raising to the memory of their champion of right, morality, and sobriety should bear the words, "Go tell it to future generations that he lived and died contending for his convictions of justice and right."

Toward the end he said to her who was dearer to him than the ruddy drops that fed his heart:

I have lived my convictions. I only wish I could live longer to provide better for my family.

He came from the great masses of the people from whence have ever come the truly great. He was loyal and true to the masses. He had learned the full meaning of the immortal plowman's words:

The honest man, tho' e'er sae poor,
Is king o' men for a' that.

He early learned in life's battle that as loyal, noble, and great a heart can beat within the homespun shirt of the toiler in mine or field or factory as pulsates beneath the royal purple of a prince; and that is why men love the memory and mourn the death of this golden-hearted knight of the people, who lived and died without fear and without reproach.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, Judge PARK, the successor of Judge RODDENBERY, has described in his remarks the life of Judge RODDENBERY as seen by the people of his home in Thomasville. He requested me to refer in my remarks to his life as seen in Washington.

The first Sunday after my arrival in Washington my steps carried me to the Fifth Baptist Church, where John E. Briggs, a Georgia man, is pastor. I did not know Judge RODDENBERY then, and made his acquaintance at this church. The following week a stranger came to my office and requested me to lecture at Falls Church. I wondered who had recommended me to this stranger. When I visited Falls Church I knew without inquiry, because I found that Judge RODDENBERY was much loved by the membership of that church.

From the first day of our acquaintance we became fast friends, and our friendship became so noticeable that it was commented upon on the floor of the House. The day he left Washington he bade me good-by, full of hope; he thought he would return to Washington in a few weeks, though he realized he was seriously ill. He thought he had temporary heart trouble and expected to return and amend the pending bill. He lived only a few days.

I never knew a man for whom I had higher regard; he was a Christian statesman. If he had sorrows and troubles, he never allowed them to becloud the lives of others. Wherever he went he scattered sunshine, and his presence dispelled cares.

One of the chief characteristics of his life was he loved his fellow man. When he entered the portals of the eternal home he found written on the Lamb's Book of Life by the King of that home, "When I was sick and in prison ye visited me; when I was hungry ye fed me; when I was thirsty ye gave me drink."

And this his epitaph shall be:
Now ended are his days.
None knew him but to love him,
None named him but to praise.

I regard Judge RODDENBERY as one of the greatest men Georgia has ever produced. He was an indomitable fighter, conscientious, and courageous to a fault, if man can be. He was a giant in intellect. I was closely identified with him in the pension fight of the Sixty-second Congress. I made my first speech in the second session of the Sixty-second Congress on pensions. Judge RODDENBERY was delighted with my outspoken stand, and outlined with me a plan to make a determined fight against pensions. He thought by preventing passage of pension bills the attention of the country could be forcibly called to the unchecked pension increase; that the newspapers would take up the unusual procedure commonly called "filibuster" and thus bring it to the attention of the public. I have seen him hold the floor all day and until 12 o'clock at night when the absence of a quorum would prevent the passage of the omnibus pension bill. The bill would probably pass at a later date, but in the meantime the attention of the country was riveted upon this unusual procedure.

He was one of the best parliamentarians of the House, and his knowledge of strategic parliamentary rules often brought defeat to measures he opposed. Speaker CLARK recognized his ability and very often called upon him to preside when important measures were up for passage. Speaker CLARK stated shortly after his death that if he had been called upon to select three of the best parliamentarians of the Sixty-second Congress, Judge RODDENBERY would have been one of the three.

On account of my intimacy with Judge RODDENBERY the membership of the House spoke frequently of him to me before and since his death. I have heard distinguished statesmen say that they considered Judge RODDENBERY one of the purest and one of the most intellectual Members of the Sixty-second Congress. He was a student and master of subjects in detail. His devotion to his books and official duties of his district kept him at his desk too much for his declining health. He loved the open-air life, but the charm of mastering congressional questions chained him to his desk. Judge RODDENBERY attended every detail of office correspondence. Requests from humble citizens may have been small and unimportant to many people, but they were large and important to him. The life of Judge RODDENBERY is a symbol of righteousness, and his spotless name is a priceless inheritance for his family.

Mr. Speaker, frequent are the chairs made vacant in this House. The life of a Congressman who takes part in legislation, meets home demands, with constant political contests to retain his seat, is a ceaseless struggle, and therefore let me remind you that he is liable to forget his full duty to the God who gave him life.

What have you done? my Lord will say when we meet at the end of the King's highway.
Did you give the mother back her boy?
Did you mend the children's broken toy?
Did you soothe the cares the world's annoy?
What have you done? my Lord will say when we meet at the end of the King's highway.

[Mr. SAUNDERS addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, there may be some who would not have expected me to be present on this occasion. I was not intimately acquainted with Mr. RODDENBERY. Personally I saw but little of him. I knew him best by his work in this Chamber. Here his course was such that we found little in common and seldom accorded in our votes. As a descendant of New England ancestors I had inherited with my blood principles, and possibly prejudices, to which he was intensely opposed. My education and early associations led me in paths of thought which diverged from his as widely as the poles. As the son of a Union soldier my views often conflicted with the sentiments which he so freely and positively expressed, and I have felt, and feel now, that he and I represented in some degree the extreme views of two sections of our country.

But, Mr. Speaker, I trust that the time will never come when such matters will cloud my judgment as to the merits of a political opponent or prevent my paying a deserved tribute to his memory. Mr. RODDENBERY's life and character were such that I wish to-day to add, if I can, a few sentences to show the esteem in which he was held by those with whom he so often contended.

I do not mean by what I have said to indicate that he and I ever had any personal differences. On the contrary, such personal relations as we had were cordial. The statements which I have made and some that I shall hereafter make are because I feel that they might to some extent add force to my words if the circumstances under which they were uttered were understood by those who might chance to read them.

I shall never forget the first time I ever saw Mr. RODDENBERY and heard him speak on this floor. When he rose the House was in some disorder, and one who seeks to address it under such circumstances is like a swimmer struggling against tide and wave. Few succeed by their own personality in quelling such a disturbance, and he, least of all, seemed capable of coping with it. As I looked I saw that he was so slight of build that he seemed lost in this great Hall. To add to his difficulties, it was apparent, as he began to speak, that the majority of the House were not in sympathy with his purpose, and at first the turmoil only swelled the louder. But as he proceeded he threw himself into the debate with such indomitable force and energy that his slender frame quivered with emotion, his voice rose strong above the uproar, his spirit blazed forth in burning words, and the House, in admiration for the man, gave respectful attention.

Thus it was always with him. In whatever part he took in debate he entered into the thick of the contest with his whole soul. Opposition, however powerful, instead of daunting him caused him to rise to new heights of endeavor. Time and again he fought single handed against a majority, and whatever the result, and though often the odds were too heavy against him, he was never cast down by defeat nor exalted by victory.

Possibly if this were all I should not be here to-day, but he had other and higher characteristics. Mr. RODDENBERY fought not for mere love of forensic combat, but for the principles which he professed and wished to establish. One great source of his strength was that the rugged honesty of the man was reflected in his very countenance. Like every noble soul he was candor itself. He had no small tricks, no dissimulation, and was incapable of deceit. Thus he won the respect of the House, and with respect consideration.

Mr. RODDENBERY typified in a large degree public men of a bygone age. A northern political historian, himself well known to fame in public life, has said that the southern statesmen of the old school were remarkable in their freedom from any taint or shadow of corruption, and that with them personal gain was always subordinated to the public service. In the present day it has become common to insinuate that men of high character are seldom found in public life, and that our legislators have deteriorated from the standards of the past. Mr. RODDENBERY was a fine type of the public man that his section can and does so often produce, and his life and character showed that old-time virtues have not become extinct in our political life. He was needed here, and yet, Mr. Speaker, it is not strange to me that the inexorable hand of death beckoned to him early. He would not, perhaps could not, spare or save himself. His strength was sapped by his labors. The consuming fire of his energy rose too high for his delicate frame. The soul was too great for the physical man, and his devotion to duty was such that it demanded life itself.

But such men are not dead; they live in the hearts of their countrymen. The verdict of history will be that he was notable in those qualities which go to make up the best and strongest characters and was a man of whom his State may well be proud. I doubt not that his grateful fellow citizens will long remember his services and that time will only make his memory the brighter.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I have never doubted that "A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches." It is more valuable than any other earthly consideration, except to merit a good name. It makes secure respectability and credit during life. It insures the admiration of posterity after death. A man's wife and children, proud of his standing and achievements while he lives, can rejoice after his death in the record he made, and the fame he left to shed luster on his name and theirs.

When, in company with the committees of the Senate and House, I attended the funeral of our deceased friend, Hon. S. A. RODDENBERY I realized more vividly than ever how the love and gratitude of a people could appreciate reputation and honor, and glorify a righteous man who had lived a noble life. The beautiful town in which he made his happy home and for which he had done so much, mourned his untimely death, and all united to honor his memory by following his body to the grave. From all the countryside, and the neighboring towns and counties, came throngs of people to drop a tear and cast a flower. The venerable man of God who had led him to Christ in youth, baptized him, and been his spiritual guide, friend, and admirer through all of his subsequent eventful career, spoke eloquently, sweetly, and truthfully of the life and character of the deceased, and all who heard realized that his words were true.

The grief of the mourners that he had died so soon was mitigated by a feeling of consolation and satisfaction that he had so long lived to bless and help them. I would rather have said of me, when dead, the words spoken at the funeral of Brother RODDENBERY by that good man than to have won the renown and died the death of Alexander the Great. Mark Antony's eloquent address when "great Cæsar fell" seems but "sounding brass and tinkling cymbals" when compared to the description of the dead Christian, patriot, and statesman rendered by that holy man of God.

Brother RODDENBERY began his splendid education which prepared him for such a useful life with the admonition of Sacred Writ, "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." He believed the injunction with a promise, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and His righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you." He believed the psalmist had "never seen the righteous forsaken nor his seed begging bread," but that if a man fears God and does his duty "whatsoever he doeth shall prosper." People loved and trusted him because they realized that he loved and trusted them. He studied law, and, being a good man with brains as well as honesty, he became a great lawyer. On the same principle he became a wise and useful legislator. His energy was indefatigable; his mind and heart expanded to a magnitude out of all proportion to his physical strength. In this House he performed prodigies sometimes almost single-handed and alone. Even those who differed from him and condemned his positions admitted his integrity and steadfast purpose, and gloried in his ability. Even those who resisted his contentions loved him in life for his honesty, gentleness, and candor, and now honor his memory in death as a great, sincere, and good man.

His domestic life was exemplary, beautiful, and happy. Fortunate in winning a lovely and accomplished Christian wife, he immediately decided like the valiant man of old, "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." Accordingly, as the union was blessed with intelligent and happy children, they were brought up in the "nurture and admonition of the Lord." He also recognized the wisdom of providing for his own, "especially those of his own household," and furnished them in abundance the conveniences and comforts of life.

The children old enough are already far advanced in their education. The younger ones are being carefully nurtured and trained in the same manner with ample though moderate means, under the guidance of their splendid and pious mother. Happy would our country be if we had more men of the character and energy of S. A. RODDENBERY; fortunate and glorious would be the state of society if all bereaved wives and children could cherish the memory of having lived and loved with such a husband and father and rejoice in the name and fame that follow such a man.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, there are a number of Members who are unable to be present to-day who desire to express their appreciation of the life, character, and services of our deceased colleague, Mr. RODDENBERY, and I ask unanimous consent that all Members who desire to do so may have the privilege of printing remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all Members desiring to do so be given leave to print remarks on the life, character, and public services of our late colleague, Mr. RODDENBERY. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, there is no utterance that moves my heart with a deeper emotion than an expression in honor of the qualities of a good man, when they can be truly expressed in reference either to public or to private life.

It was not my pleasure to know Mr. RODDENBERY intimately, as many of those here present did. My acquaintance with him began when, sitting upon this side of the chamber in the closing days of the Sixty-second Congress, I had come here in order to be among the Members of the House and to familiarize myself as best I could with its workings, and to ascertain how the actual proceedings of the House differ from the theory with which I had some familiarity. I watched the proceedings of gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber. While I had intended to remain only a little while, I became so interested in the activities of the House in those exciting days, and especially, was I so impressed with the ardent interest of many Members in certain measures and by none more than the Member whose departure we mourn to-day, that I remained throughout the closings days up to the end of the session. During those days many Members attracted my attention. As a stranger to you all, I was in position to study the body. Mr. RODDENBERY impressed me as one of the interesting figures in this House.

I studied him at close range, not as a personal friend, but only as a stranger would watch the activities of a man possessed of qualities of leadership. My acquaintance with him did not extend beyond the opportunity to speak to him a few times. Later, my admiration increased because of the way he performed his part and carried out his conception of his duty on this floor, an admiration which I expressed to him in terms of congratulation after one of his battles. I naturally became interested in him, as to who he was, what he had done, and as a matter of course looked over the record of his career, which is certainly a source of admiration, enthusiasm, and inspiration to every American. It offers proof of the statement of the sage of Concord that our country is but another name for opportunity.

Note the steps of the success of an American. Born on a farm, educated in a rural school, worked alternately on the farm and in the store to enable him to get ready for college to perfect his intellectual training. Entered college, where he must have won recognition, because he accepted a position in the chair of languages and mathematics, which was a sufficient evidence of his intellectual acumen. His high standing among his home people is attested by his entering upon public life. He became a member of the legislature. So his educational career as a teacher went beyond the college walls and extended into the larger field of legislation, where he could impress his convictions not on college youth alone, but upon the citizenship of his State by legislative enactment. Soon he voluntarily left the legislature to take up some other work and to prepare himself the better to do the work that was awaiting him. He became a student of the law.

As I understand from those who knew him intimately, he continued to teach while carrying on his studies in law. In this he was following in the tracks of many of the most famous men in political and professional life, such as Horace Mann, while tutoring in Brown University, his Alma Mater. This item in the life of our departed Member shows his diligence that so marked his later career, and especially his life here in Washington.

In due time he was called to the judgeship of his county court, over which, from what I can find, he presided with dignity and honor, and then leaving that post of his own will to further his work as a practitioner, he ultimately came into a still larger field, that of the executive of his own town, which new duties were simply an addition to his duties as a lawyer, and which admirably fitted for the new post. For four years he served in the humble position as chairman of the board of education. That is one of the incidents that appeals to me most, for there is no particular honor that causes a man to say very enthusiastic things about one who will be willing to go into this lesser kind of work to help and direct the education of the county. When in 1836 Horace Mann was asked by the governor of Massachusetts to become secretary of the first State board of education in the country, he first declined on the basis of lack of fitness. Later he left the law to take up this work.

Those are the evidences of the altruism of the men and women of the nation who are willing to let the next generation be their clients. This altruism marks the Member whose memory we are to-day honoring.

After filling all these places of trust with that dignity that befits a self-made American citizen he came to this, the greatest school in the world, the House of Representatives.

Mr. Speaker, these are the steps taken by our lamented brother which make up the ladder of signal success, so uniformly desirable in America. They stretch from the beginnings which are small to an achievement which is great, and ought to be an inspiration to every American. I study his life and the lives of other successful men as I would were I preparing to speak to a group of college boys where I wanted to draw a lesson for their inspiration for achievement in our country. Such men afford a fine example of what can be accomplished by the dint of effort.

My attention was also called to Mr. RODDENBERY because of his frequent brilliant parliamentary fights conducted here on the floor. My impression was, there is a man who speaks not with the intention of offending anyone and yet without fear of offending. It is the utterance of an independent thinker, a man with the courage of his convictions, and one who stands for what he believes to be right, although it is in opposition, probably, to a great many that he would very much desire not to oppose.

I saw him once as I sat on this side of the House rise in his place on that side of the Chamber to speak 40 minutes under a special privilege. I noticed the fearlessness with which he spoke in opposition to a certain ruling, or position of his party, which somewhat involved his loyalty to his party if he persisted in his course of action.

The situation was the more delicate to him because it placed him in opposition to his own party, in which it seemed necessary for him to take issue with the leader of his party; and yet, in this most delicate situation, speaking without fear or favor, when he finished he sat down with not only the respect of the leader and every member of his party, but with the respect of all the Members on this side of the Chamber as well. In other words, he impressed me as a man speaking absolutely without fear on matters he believed to be right, no matter about the consequences. We all know not only this House admires such conduct and such ability on the floor, but all men everywhere greatly appreciate such public conduct.

I admired Mr. RODDENBERY for his brilliancy in parliamentary law, with which he showed himself quite familiar. As one greatly interested in parliamentary law, as a body of theory as well as actual practice in legislative bodies, having been a teacher of it in college, this part of his work I admired. Aside from my own leader, Mr. MANN, the most wonderful mind in his grasp of the details of the House I ever knew or read of, I watched Mr. RODDENBERY with the greatest pleasure when he rose to speak; he always demonstrated that he knew what he was talking about and insisted upon the maintenance of certain ruling when he spoke with a full knowledge of the subject. Here on this floor is where men will finally reach their level, and is the one place where men must speak not simply to be heard. Mr. RODDENBERY seemed to know his ground before he took a position. Such men must win respect of his fellows.

Upon another occasion, in the early part of the special session, when a bill had come from the Senate with an amendment, an effort was made to have the House concur. Judge RODDENBERY was opposed to the amendment, and when a motion was pending to appoint a conference committee he led in an effort to have the conference instructed to report certain things. This precipitated a parliamentary struggle, which aroused a debate in which much feeling was displayed among interested Members. Throughout the excitement which, at times, was high, Judge RODDENBERY never once lost his equilibrium, which enabled him to demonstrate that he did not only possess the knowledge as a basis of confidence for his position, but he also possessed that greater characteristic so rare in men of complete mastery over himself. "He that masters his own spirit is greater than he who takes a city," was an old saying. This calm composure in the thickest of the fight is a great asset, and Judge RODDENBERY uniformly possessed it.

It seems to me that Judge RODDENBERY from the standpoint of a boy on the farm, student in the college, teacher in the college, judge of the court, practitioner before the people, mayor of his town, leader in State as well as in Nation, offers a splendid object lesson of inspiration to every Member in this House, as well as to all the country, that ought to be taken back to the youth of our country.

In connection with that I am thinking now of what the State of Georgia has done in the way of public education. Not by schools and colleges and technical institutions alone, but by popular education upon the rostrum. I was told by a lyceum bureau that one-fourth of the talent that that bureau was handling, which are known to the lyceum world as stars, who were on the lyceum platform doing public work as public educators, molding public opinion, came from within a circle of not over 100 miles radius, with the center at Atlanta. This was when General Gordon, Grady, Graves, Lamar, Sam Jones, Sam Small, and others were in their prime.

I have not had the pleasure of hearing Mr. RODDENBERY on the lecture platform. I can not therefore speak of that field of public interest in influencing public opinion. Men can not always be equal; they may be strong at one place, they may not be able to reach such standard at another place; but I have studied Judge RODDENBERY pretty carefully in this House, and I think his fame will be able to hold up the standard, and he will not suffer because of the career and high rank heretofore set by the great State of Georgia.

I close by simply saying that when we see a life that we so much appreciate because of its promise closed out so early we ask ourselves the question why is it that this splendid, effective, energetic, conscientious personality, so surcharged with conviction of duty, was so soon cut off. The answer comes that man's life is not to be counted in years; it is not in the days that we live but rather in the work that we do that makes the test of a man's life. It is not an extensive life that counts but an intensive living, and I am quite certain that although cut off in a very short life Mr. RODDENBERY will bring a recognition in his own community as well as in the Nation at large by a life well spent when measured by what was accomplished. It was not my pleasure to know him in his home, but what I have heard from this floor from the lips of those who knew him well is sufficient. His life, though soon cut off, was such that it must be a priceless heritage to his family. Of course no words of ours at these moments of bereavement can assuage the grief that so overwhelms his loved ones. But surely it is a consolation to them to know how he was cherished both by political friend and foe—the very best test of one's manhood. It is a touching tribute well merited that we here in this Chamber, the seat of his greatest service, gather on this holy day to attest our appreciation of the dignity, devotion, and high character of a fellow Member who has fallen by the wayside, and has left us to carry on the work to which he was so devoted.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, permit a personal friend and admirer to pay a simple tribute to the memory of SEABORN A. RODDENBERY. How frequently this Hall is being devoted to Sabbath service, which means memorials for its departed Members. Especially has this become true since our membership has been increased and the strain of activity has been set to the limit in extraordinary as well as regular sessions.

One who sits in this Hall listening to daily debates during the week and memorials on the Sabbath might designate it as a forum for criticism of the living and eulogy of the dead. It would not be an accurate judgment. But if it were, it yet were well. In our daily contests we ought and often do the manly act. But when dissolving time fades into eternal existence, then the best which is in us invariably forges to the front and sees only the best in our departed brother's career. We forget his weakness and foibles and see him as we would that God might see us—in the light of our merit and virtues rather than obscured by our shortcomings and vices.

From the various States and sections of this vast Nation men come to this Hall. Each brings some of the narrowness and prejudice of life's environment, unprepared to see or take the viewpoint of our fellow Members. Hence it is said to be uniformly the case that the least patience is exercised with the views of our colleagues in our early years of service; and that tolerance always comes for them, increasing as the years and the terms come and go.

We see the lack of universal application of our own beliefs. We consider at least toleration of our colleagues' principles until differences in detail are largely removed and only for large essentials do most here do battle, in this the best, and I hope always to be, the greatest forum of the world.

We learn to measure our colleagues, not by the particular doctrine which they espouse and proclaim, but by the honesty, sincerity, and zeal—or their lack—by which they advocate them. A man in this House represents that which he deems best and most important arising out of his life, education, environment, philosophy, political affiliation, hopes, and personal ambition. All of these are influenced, often controlled, by what appears to us to be the best interests of the greatest number of the people whose commission we hold for their representation at this great Capitol. Here questions ranging from the personal right of a constituent to have a public document up through the larger questions affecting the industries of our districts to and through those involving national and even world-wide importance are considered.

To this Hall our deceased brother brought much—a finished education, a large measure of culture, a keen, incisive mind, an unusual command of forensic English, and keen appreciation of the joys and exhilarations of the debate duello. He took blow and thrust with equanimity and at par, but he responded with usury. His zeal among his virtues and qualities shown fervent and resplendent. He had the resolution of an Alpine defender and the spirit of a crusader. It was this which perhaps challenged and received most criticism from his fellows, but if this be offense or fault constituents are ready to condone. Yea, more; they will commend. Congressman RODDENBERY spoke to his colleagues but for his constituents as he saw the latter's wishes and interests demand. In this he was truly representative.

A learned divine once said, "The master of a learned profession at last becomes its slave." That quality most frequently and strenuously exercised often becomes our undoing. It was the zeal of the departed which hastened him to the tomb. To bear up and protect a marked mentality nature gave him but a frail tenement, which, taxed beyond its capacity, called him early to his final home. This was before the ripeness of years crowned his efforts with that measure of distinction which would undoubtedly have been his had he lived, and which achieved would have been a proud fact for his family, his district, his State, and Nation.

A deep religious sentiment pervaded our deceased brother's thought, was revealed in his speech, and actuated his career. This, combined with domestic devotion for wife, child, parent, and home, added much, as it does to any public man, in the estimate of his fellows.

Among the young Members of the House we watched his activities, appreciated his ability, noted his genuine measure of advancement, and agreed in the estimate which saw in prospect rich civic prizes and honors in his promising career. A career closed in the rich early period of its florescence, its full fruitage is left to the good time and season of Him who doeth all things well.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, with sad hearts we pay our tributes to the memory of our comrade who has been called from labor to eternal rest. While he had been for many years a prominent figure in the affairs of our State, yet it was not my good fortune to personally know SEABORN ANDERSON RODDENBERY until he entered the Sixty-first Congress to fill out the unexpired term of the late Congressman James M. Griggs.

By reputation I had known Mr. RODDENBERY for several years, and had a high opinion of him. One could not set a proper standard of appreciation upon him until you knew him well. In the Sixty-first, the Sixty-second, and up to his untimely death in the extra session of the present Congress I was thrown with Mr. RODDENBERY a great deal. He was one of my good friends. I admired his noble character, his ability, and his unselfish devotion to duty. His was an upright and useful life. Georgia, his native State, and the whole country sustained a great loss when this faithful servant passed away.

Born and reared on a Georgia farm, coming out of the great heart of the common people, he knew and loved those people. They knew and loved him in return. At the age of 21 years he was elected to the Georgia Legislature, where he served with ability and distinction. He declined reelection to that body. He studied law while teaching school, and was admitted to the bar in 1894. He made a success at the bar. In 1897 he was appointed judge of the county court of Thomas County, in which position he served his people with fidelity and honor. He declined reappointment as judge of the county court in order to devote his time and talents to the general practice of his profession. His people had need of him, however, and elected him mayor of Thomasville, in which position he gave such excellent service and satisfaction that he was reelected without opposition. He was also president of the board of education of Thomas County for four years. In all these places of public trust he showed that devotion to duty which marked him among men. His people, to whom he was ever true, were not content to let his honors cease. They had further need for his splendid abilities and energies. They elected him to the United States Congress, where he soon identified and distinguished himself as one of the great men of this great body.

It is indeed most fitting that those who knew his worth through daily and intimate association should gather in this Chamber, where the most important and effective part of his work was done, for the purpose of expressing sincere and affectionate appreciation of a life dedicated in high degree to the public service. The tributes paid to him are well deserved, because they were earned by years of devotion to the interests of our country, because his record as a Representative in Congress was characterized at all times by zeal for the public good. To the people who trusted and honored him he gladly gave all that was highest and best in him.

Few outside of his close associates knew how hard he worked or how much he had accomplished. Despite the fact that he had been in Congress but a few years, he was recognized as a ready and active debater. He was ever alert to protect the principles and policies that he avowed. Independent in spirit and free from affectation, he sought in all that he did to perform the highest duty to his country.

No man ever worked harder for the time he was in Congress than did Judge RODDENBERY. He was literally a slave to duty. He neglected his own affairs and even his own health that he might give to his country an unselfish and devoted service.

Much that is great and noble can be said of his public services, but high above all this, which is more beautiful and more enduring, it can be said that Judge RODDENBERY was truly a good man and a Christian. Well may the youth of Georgia and of the world emulate the example which was set for them by this great and good man.

He was a tender and devoted husband, a loving father, a loyal friend, a patriot, a scholar, a great judge, a statesman, and a Christian gentleman, whose mission on earth was a service of devotion that "to-morrow might be better than to-day," and whose reward, I am sure, has been found in the words "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

I can not close this feeble and brief tribute without referring to the personal loss which has come to us who represent Georgia in this House of Representatives. A loyal colleague, upon whose judgment we had come to rely, is gone. He was more than a colleague. He was a warm-hearted friend, always courteous, kind, and considerate. We shall miss him, and memories of him will ever be a cherished possession for all who knew him. His voice is hushed, his form has disappeared, but surely such a soul can never die. The memory of such a life, the influence of such a noble character, will live on forever.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Speaker, since receiving the kind invitation to participate in these exercises my duties upon this floor have prevented me from making any special preparation. Yet I would not feel quite right to myself, nor would I feel quite right toward the Members of this House if I did not say just a few words expressive of my appreciation of my deceased friend, Mr. RODDENBERY. It so happened that when I first visited Washington to look after what I might be expected to do in the Congress to which I was elected I met Mr. RODDENBERY at the Union Station. We stopped at the same hotel, and when I came here to enter upon the duties of the special session we also stopped at the same hotel. I realized very quickly that he had come from the far southland, with all of the traditions, environments, and possibly prejudices of that region. I had come from the far northland, with all of the environments, traditions, and possibly prejudices of that section of the country.

It was a matter of some surprise to myself, and more surprise to many of our friends, that Mr. RODDENBERY and I should become so closely attached as friends. We spent many hours in walking and talking during the evenings of the long, hot summer of the special session. But it was not long after I met him before I found that there was a real bond of sympathy between us. He had come to Congress imbued with an idea that he wanted to be of real genuine service to the humble people of his district. I think I have never in all my life met a man so thoroughly wrapped up in the thought that he wanted to be of service to those who were not really in a position to serve themselves, and I think those of you who will take the pains to recall his every word and every act upon the floor of this House will agree that this was his controlling, forceful thought. He had been reared among the common people. He had seen their sorrows, and he had felt their oppression; he had known of their struggles. He had realized what a dollar meant to such people, and when he saw, as every one has seen, extravagant appropriations made for at least doubtful purposes, and when he realized that that money, in part at least, had to be wrung from the toiling hands of the poor, with whom he had lived and associated, it aroused in him the keenest disapproval.

And many times this House has been shocked and sometimes displeased when it would hear coming from that corner of the House, "Mr. Speaker, I object." Those words were actuated not, as some thought, by a vindictive spirit. That was never true. What he did was done by reason of the fact that Mr. RODDENBERY felt that the money gathered from the common people, largely, should not be squandered and put to purposes that are not needed.

One of the things that always struck me with peculiar force in the character of Mr. RODDENBERY was the fact that he was honest. By honest I do not mean what is commonly applied to that term. I do not mean that he simply paid his debts, that he was not guilty of fraud, but he had an honest mind, a mind that was directed along lines of absolute integrity. He did not try to form his opinions to suit somebody's preconception of something that would please the membership of the House, or those with whom he was associated. He took his facts and his logic, and, applying to them his own mind, he went where his judgment told him; and that was just as true in private conversation as it was upon the floor of this House. In the many, many conversations I have had with him I have always found that he was honest intellectually, and I can say frankly that that was the one thing that inspired my greatest admiration. If there is anything in the world that I can truly admire, it is a man who is honest intellectually. It is very easy to be honest in many things, but it really takes a strong character to be honest intellectually.

I do not need to tell you of his industry. I believe I have never known a more industrious man. Our rooms were close together, and I have known of his working until 1, 2, and 3 o'clock in the morning.

Another thing that commended Mr. RODDENBERY to me very much was his bravery. I do not mean that bravery that would make him a great soldier, for I do not know but that he might have run from the battlefield; but he was brave with his convictions, and from what little I have seen in life it requires a great deal more courage to be brave in time of peace than it does in time of war. I recall just one little circumstance that probably all of you will remember that challenged my admiration. A bill had been called up by unanimous consent. Several gentlemen, some from this side of the House and some from that side of the House, had made speeches under the privilege of reserving the right to object, and all of them had said that such a bill ought not to be considered in that way. People would gather around the Member, and the first thing we knew the Member would say that he withdrew his objection. So it went on this side of the House and on that side of the House, until perhaps a dozen had gone through that same performance, and all of them had withdrawn their objections. It looked as though the bill were going to pass by unanimous consent, although I know that it was the conviction of a large majority of the House that such a bill ought not to pass, when over in that corner of the House a little gentleman arose and said, "Mr. Speaker, I object." I leaned over to a friend sitting beside me and said, "That objection will not be withdrawn." One-half of that whole side of the House flocked to Mr. RODDENBERY, and some even from this side of the House, and brought all of the pressure they could upon him, but he sat there and smiled and said, "No, gentlemen, I have objected and I mean it."

It is that kind of courage on the floor of this House that challenges at least my admiration. He believed the bill ought not to pass and it ought not to pass in that way, and notwithstanding the pressure of political friends he had the courage to say, "Mr. Speaker, I object."

I was also very much interested in the skill with which he handled his parliamentary propositions. Among what may be termed the younger set he was clearly the best parliamentarian on the floor of this House. He had the keenest, clearest perception of the rules and had mastered them, and he always knew just when and where and how to take advantage of his knowledge of those rules. It was an inspiring sight to see one of our young Members successfully competing upon the floor of this House with the able parliamentarians on both sides; and in my recollection, I never saw him worsted.

All of these things lead simply to one thought; that is, that he was every inch a man. He was honest, he was brave, he had a heart of profound sympathy for the struggling masses of humanity, and he had that industry that prepared and equipped him for fighting the battles of the common people, and he fought them.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the Nation can ill afford to lose from its service men like SEABORN ANDERSON RODDENBERY, in memory of whom these exercises are held to-day. In whatever station of life he was placed, whether educator or jurist, mayor, or Member of this body, the word "Duty" was his guiding star. With singleness of purpose, with unswerving determination to do right as God gave him to see the right, he applied himself to every task. None was too small for his painstaking labor; none too great but was encompassed by the clear light of his fine intellect.

From his earliest youth he had given himself to study whenever time permitted and opportunity offered. He was voracious in his appetite for knowledge. He delved deep for facts, taking nothing for granted. He mastered every detail of every subject that engaged his attention, and every essential was marshaled in his mind with unfailing accuracy, ready for use at any moment.

Our friend and colleague was of sturdy stock. He was a son of the soil. From the moment of his birth he breathed the pure air of the country. City life knew him not until he came to Washington. A farmer's son, he grew up a farmer, and to the last minute of his life he held an abiding interest in everything that pertained to agriculture. He was not satisfied with merely knowing the A B C of the farmer's work. Not only did he study farming and the farmer's needs from a scientific standpoint, but he went even further and traced agriculture from the crudest beginning among prehistoric peoples through the centuries even unto our day. He did not exploit his research in the pages of magazines to gain temporary fame, but in his modest way was content to bring the results of his investigations to the knowledge of farmers' institutes in his native State.

Almost more than any man I ever knew Mr. RODDENBERY had the habit of study. It seemed to have been born in him. While working on the farm and in a country store his evenings were devoted to storing his mind with useful knowledge. Books were his diversion. He was an omnivorous reader. His education was gained in the county schools and at Mercer University. Even before becoming of age he filled the chair of languages and mathematics at South Georgia College, and while a teacher he applied himself to the study of the law. When barely past legal age he was elected to the State legislature, served for two sessions, and then declined reelection. Within three years after being admitted to the bar he was appointed a county judge. After having served with honor for four years he declined reappointment, but subsequently filled the office of mayor of Thomasville for two terms and served as president of the county board of education for four years. Then came his election as a Representative, and here in our midst he labored in the Sixty-first, the Sixty-second, and the first session of the present Congress.

He was in the very flush of manhood, at an age when, it is said, men begin to do their best work. He was exceptionally well equipped for the work of legislation. I want to emphasize the word "work" in this case, for ANDERSON RODDENBERY was not satisfied with merely casting his vote for or against any measure as party policy or party behest might dictate or expediency might suggest. He went to the heart of every proposition presented for his consideration and action. For him there were no "unconsidered trifles." The thing had to be clear in his mind and understanding before gaining his assent or being rejected.

In his endeavor to reach a correct conclusion he shunned no labor, however much of a strain it might prove to be upon his mental and physical energies. And after he had convinced himself that a certain line of action would be right or wrong, as the case might be, he squared action with conviction, and no amount of persuasion or abuse could swerve him once he had taken his stand. Some people might call this sheer obstinacy under some circumstances, but so long as his conscience approved he cared for no man's censure and courted no man's approbation.

Honesty, faithfulness, and diligence were marked characteristics in his make-up. If there was at times severity in his acts, he never lacked in courtesy to whomsoever might be brought in contact with him. He was scrupulous in measuring out justice in his relations with his fellow men in all stations of life.

As a Member of this House Mr. RODDENBERY was unwearying in caring for the interests of his district and State. Every request that came to him from his constituents was promptly and minutely attended to. On the committees to which he had been assigned he was an untiring worker, and his reports were models of conciseness and completeness. His legislative activity did not stop short at matters of mere local import or subjects immediately intrusted to him for investigation and report. He participated actively in all debates on important measures of general interest, and his keen, analytical acumen discovered with unfailing directness the weak points in an opponent's argument or the blemishes in proposed legislation. Those things that did not commend themselves to his sense of justice or fairness he opposed with uncompromising persistency and severity, and he availed himself of every proper device to make his opposition effective.

We all remember his inflexible resistance to the passage of omnibus pension bills. We remember how he fought them from the moment they came into the House until the final vote upon them had been taken. We remember how he exhausted every parliamentary means to encompass their defeat. We remember also how in every instance he failed in his efforts. But however much many of his colleagues may have differed with him as to the advisability of that sort of legislation; no matter whether they regarded the position taken by him as ill-advised or not, none could withhold their meed of admiration for the courage with which he maintained his views, even with the certainty of defeat staring him in the face. And such admiration was properly bestowed. It is easy to espouse a popular cause, but it partakes of heroism for a man to antagonize such a one. Therefore howsoever Mr. RODDENBERY'S work as a Representative in Congress may be judged, either by his contemporaries or by posterity, it must always be said of him that he had the courage of his convictions and acted as he thought.

There comes to my mind other instances of our friend's persistency in the face of defeat. In every case he did what he thought was right, and measured up to the highest standard.

> The greatest man is he who chooses right with the most invincible resolution; who resists the sorest temptation from within and without; who bears the heaviest burdens cheerfully; who is calmest in storms and most fearless under menaces and frowns; whose reliance on truth, on virtue, and on God is most unfaltering.

If Mr. RODDENBERY had been permitted to continue his service here, he would, I doubt not, have added to his prestige as a legislator. But, alas, disease fell upon him the ravages of which his body was unable to withstand, and he paid the tribute to nature which sooner or later we all must render.

Mr. BELL of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, it is with sad hearts that we to-day are called upon to speak of the parting with us of our dear friend and colleague, Judge SEABORN A. RODDENBERY. I knew Judge RODDENBERY intimately while he was a Member of this body and I had the opportunity of studying his characteristics. He was a man of unquestionable character, honest, sincere, and courageous. While his career as a Member of Congress was short, it was nevertheless fruitful and marked with ability. He was elected to fill a vacancy caused by the death of our lamented friend, Judge Griggs, and was a faithful Representative of his people until September 25, 1913, when the mantle of death came over him and took from our midst one of the truest, bravest, and best men Georgia or the South has produced in many years. He was devoted to his duties as a public servant, constant in his attentions to his constituents, and loyal to the rights of the people who elected him to the high position which he filled with honor and distinction. He filled many positions of trust before entering upon the duties and responsibilities as a Member of Congress, and was therefore well equipped for the great problems which confront the people of this great Nation. He was zealous and a strong advocate in all matters in which he felt interested, and nothing could persuade him or turn him from that which he believed right and just. He was a lawyer of extraordinary ability, safe as a counselor and fair as a judge. He recognized the rights of every individual, and never lost sight of his duty to himself or his kindred affection to humanity. His sole purpose in life was to do right and do justice to those with whom he came in contact, and he had a high regard for the opinions and purposes of his coworkers. He was indeed a remarkable man; although young and with a limited experience as a national lawmaker, he was fast developing into a national figure and was forging his way to the front as a leader in the affairs of the Nation; and his opinions and rulings as a presiding officer, with his quick perception of parliamentary law and its usages, was impressed upon those who watched his career in his latter days, when frequently he was called upon to preside over the deliberations of Congress.

It is indeed unfortunate that such a promising and bright life should have been checked by the sad reaper, death. As a man he was loved by all who knew him. As a friend, he was steadfast and true. He was honest, sincere, and would not engage in deceptive methods and trickery which sometimes characterize modern politicians. He was a gentleman by birth and training, and I never knew him to be guilty of the least act unbecoming a true man or a respectable citizen. He was held in high esteem by all the people of his district, old and young, rich and poor. He was a leader in the great fight for temperance in Georgia, and probably no individual is entitled to more credit for this reform in the Empire State than Mr. RODDENBERY. If he had a hobby it was always on the side of right, and he never failed to let his friends and admirers know his position on any question which affected them.

He was a devoted husband, loved his family, and always enjoyed the society of his children, and would never let any opportunity escape when he could do anything to add to their pleasure and happiness. Indeed, my friends, we have lost a good man. We can sympathize with those dear to him who are left to mourn his departure, but we can not fathom the mysteries of life, but we can believe and feel and hope that our loss is his eternal gain.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I feel that I want to say a word upon this solemn occasion, because I come from a section of the country where many of the opinions and positions that were espoused by our friend, Judge RODDENBERY, on the floor of this House, were looked upon with a good deal of disapproval, and I think perhaps with some degree of misunderstanding. For that reason I have wanted to speak briefly this afternoon.

From my close association with Judge RODDENBERY I know that every position he ever took upon any measure pending before this House was taken in absolute sincerity, and from the standpoint of his belief in the public good.

I knew this man well. I know that he harbored in his heart no hate for any man. In what little experience I have had I never met a more tender, loving, sympathetic soul than was possessed by S. A. RODDENBERY of Georgia.

As I speak for a few moments, there comes to me a flood of memories. I can not forget the circumstances under which I first became acquainted with him. With two other Members of the House I was invited to speak at a celebration which the patriotic people of Falls Church, Va., had arranged, two years ago last Fourth of July. I did not know who the other Members were who were invited, but when we went to the car I found that beside myself the Members of the House who had been invited to speak were Mr. RODDENBERY and Mr. WEDEMEYER of Michigan. I shall never forget the happy hours we spent together that day, nor shall I forget the eloquent and powerful addresses that were delivered by my two friends. It is to me a sad recollection that both these young men, who had so early made such a definite and lasting impress upon the House, and who gave such promise of great service, not only to their districts, but to the States in which they lived and to their country—that these two splendid young men have gone into the great beyond.

There are a great many things of which I might speak in thinking of the characteristics of Judge RODDENBERY; but the first one that comes to my mind is that to which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY] has just referred—his superabundant courage. While I disagreed with him sharply and fundamentally upon many questions, and particularly upon that one in the discussion of which he took the most aggressive part, I felt that he was always perfectly sincere and honest and absolutely courageous in every position that he took. I remember an incident not unlike the one referred to by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY]. I remember we had been having a long fight here upon a bill. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] was opposing that bill with great ability and great eloquence and with a splendid exhibition of his knowledge of parliamentary practice. After this combat had been going on for some time, two or three of us from this side, who prized his personal friendship, went over to that corner where he always stood when he started to make a fight, and we engaged him in pleasant personal conversation and sought to dissuade him from the course which he had been pursuing. I remember that in the greatest good humor—because while Judge RODDENBERY always spoke with vigor and seemingly with great excitement, yet he always kept good-natured—when we urged him to cease his opposition to the bill he spoke in terms of the greatest good humor, but waved us aside and kept up his fight with his usual ability. I speak of that as an illustration of his unflinching courage. He did not hesitate to do the things which his most intimate friends did not want him to do if he felt that his conception of his duty to the public demanded that he should do so. Taking him all in all, I feel that Judge RODDENBERY personally was a man typical of what is best in American manhood.

Just yesterday I was reading a clipping from a poem of Kipling, that seemed to me so entirely applicable to this case that I am going to repeat it. By a peculiar coincidence the slip of paper I hold in my hand containing these lines was handed to me by our late friend and colleague, Mr. WEDEMEYER, just a few days before his untimely death. This is what Kipling says:

If you can keep your head when all about you
Are losing theirs, and blaming it on you;
If you can trust yourself when all men doubt you,
But make allowance for their doubting, too;
If you can wait and not be tired by waiting,
Or being lied about, don't deal in lies;
Or, being hated, don't give way to hating;
And yet don't look too good, nor talk too wise;

If you can dream, and not make dreams your master;
If you can think, and not make thoughts your aim;
If you can meet with triumph and disaster,
And treat those two impostors just the same;
If you can bear to hear the truth you've spoken
Twisted by knaves to make a trap for fools,
Or watch the things you gave your life to, broken,
And stoop, and build them up with wornout tools;

If you can talk with crowds and keep your virtue,
Or walk with kings, nor lose the common touch,
If neither foes nor loving friends can hurt you,
If all men count with you, but none too much;
If you can fill the unforgiving minute
With sixty seconds' worth of distance run,
Yours is the earth and everything that's in it,
And which is more, you'll be a man, my son.

It seems to me these lines express the characteristics of Judge RODDENBERY; upright, sincere, clear, and courageous, he possessed that lofty personality which we all admire and emulate.

Another characteristic it seems to me ought to impress itself on the manhood of this country, and that is the fact that with this man above all things, above devotion to the State, above his sense of duty to the Nation even, there was that splendid unfaltering devotion to the duties of the home upon which, after all, all these other institutions rest. He possessed a home life beautiful. He was devoted to it and proud of it. Well may he have said as one of our poets said:

If all the ships I have at sea,
Should come a-sailing home to me,
Laden with riches, honor, glory, gold,
Ah, well, the harbor would not hold
So many ships as there would be,
If all my ships came home to me.

If half the ships I have at sea,
Should bring their precious freight to me,
Ah, well, I should have wealth as great
As any king that lived in state,
So rich a treasure there would be,
If half my ships came home to me.

If but one ship I have at sea
Should come a-sailing home to me,
Ah, well, the storm clouds well might frown
For if the others all went down,
Still rich and glad and proud I'd be
If that one ship came home to me.

If that one ship went down at sea,
Weighed down with gems and wealth untold,
With riches, honor, glory, gold,
The poorest soul on earth I'd be,
If that one ship came not to me.

O skies be calm, O winds blow free,
Blow all my ships safe home to me.
But if thou sendest some a-wrack
To never more come sailing back,
Send any, all that sail the sea,
But send my love ship back to me.

To our friend who has gone away many of these ships that sailed the sea came home, but that one ship surely came with sails all spread, and floating above it all was the white banner of his stainless life. SEABORN A. RODDENBERY'S life is an example that the manhood of this country may well emulate. The kind of life he lived, the kind of thoughts he entertained are expressed in a few lines from an Ohio poet, Mr. Herbert, a gentleman whom my colleague [Mr. FESS] and I know very well. He wrote:

When I am gone,
Just say that, in a distant heaven
I firm believed, with faith unriven;
Yet for the heavenly earth I've striven,
When I am gone.

When I am gone,
Just say I want no gaudy wreaths,
No baubles, no well-ripened sheaves,
No crêpe, no dirge, no flowers, no leaves,
When I am gone.

When I am gone,
Just say I want no stately tread
Of plumed knights; no words well read,
In tones, sonorous, of the dead,
When I am gone.

When I am gone,
Just say to me the yielding sod
Of earth is welcome; then leave God
To deal with me, with smile or rod,
When I am gone.

Our friend Mr. RODDENBERY has gone away, but the memory of his blameless life will remain as a benediction to coming generations. His life was an inspiration, and the tender, fragrant memory of our friendly association with him will abide till latest time.

Mr. HUGHES of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, as I have listened here to-day to the loving tributes of his devoted friends, and their eloquence has thrown upon memory's screen the noble deeds of his noble life, my thoughts go back through the brief interval to the last weeks ANDERSON RODDENBERY was with us, and I see plainly his tense, dramatic figure standing there fighting with the earnestness known only to those who battle honestly and fearlessly, and with the power with which truth arms its advocates fighting for the cause of the people.

And I see, Mr. Speaker, the lines in his face grow deeper with the passing of each day; I hear his voice grow weaker, but harder and harder he fights. Filled with the purpose of defending to the uttermost the principles in which he believed with all the earnestness of his soul he was unmindful of the ravages of disease, the warnings that the fight must soon be over. Relentlessly he fought on and on until the dread hand of disease struck him down.

And this picture which comes before my mind's eye, Mr. Speaker, of that frail, almost boyish little figure, weakened by illness and under the very shadow of the Death Angel's wing fighting with the fearlessness and strength of a giant is an inspiration. It was one of those magnificent lives in which mortal flesh was subordinated to the immortal and imperishable principle. The unselfish spirit which moved ANDERSON RODDENBERY to give so freely of himself in the fight for the people is the same which moves the soldier to offer up his life upon the field of battle. For both, it is the sacrifice of self upon the altar of patriotism.

Born on his father's farm and passing through the early years of his life, those impressionable years in which the seed of character are sown, he caught the spirit of fellowship which is known best to the humblest, and he cast his lot with them. He was essentially a man of the common people, a friend of the masses.

In the year that he attained his majority he was elected a representative in the Georgia Legislature and was judge of the county court within three years after beginning the practice of law at the early age of 27. His service in each of these positions fully justified the wisdom of his people in their selection of him, for his work in the legislature was marked by that same earnestness of purpose which later, during his service in this House, attracted the attention of the Nation to the wonderful power of his brilliant mind, and in his administration of the law as judge there was mingled the sternness of justice with the tenderness of mercy.

He was twice mayor of Thomasville, and served his people in many other public capacities, and always his service was marked by consecration to duty and a superior intelligence.

In his district, his county, his city, he was ever pronounced, conspicuous, and determined in his position on all questions of good citizenship, Christianity, morality, education of mind, heart, and soul, carrying the flag of the righteous and laboring in the cause of right. He never faltered when the welfare of his country, his State, or his community was the issue.

Mr. RODDENBERY made a record in his short service in the National Congress worthy of the highest expectations of his advocates, the fondest hopes of his friends and family. He was a lawyer of fine parts, a born debater, and never appeared to better advantage than in the give and take of debate.

I was attracted by his many admirable qualities, but that which drew me closest to the inner man was not his prodigious energy, his fidelity to principle, and his skill in execution, but his private life. His precious baby daughters, Mary and Ruth, became my devoted friends. They were so endearing in their charming little mannerisms, with that beauty of the rosebud giving its promise of the full-blown rose yet to come, that I often sought their companionship for mirth and bright moments with Heaven's glorious gift, the untarnished innocence of children. The devotion, the confidence, the love of the little girls for the father, as well as their mother, brought me in closer union with ANDERSON RODDENBERY. I had an introduction through his two dear little daughters which showed to me the man in his family, a husband without guile, faithful and true, a father of tender solicitude and beautiful love. He was the sun of tenderness that radiated light and reflected happiness in the bright domain of his home.

He was known best and loved most by those among whom he lived, those who were his daily associates in business, social, and political life—the residents of Thomasville. They knew the worth of the man.

I attended the last sad rites which were administered by the hands of loving and devoted friends, and it was deeply touching to see the personal loss his people suffered. To them it was not only Congressman RODDENBERY who died, but ANDERSON RODDENBERY, neighbor and friend. His name lives in the archives of the Nation, but shines brighter and more resplendent in the hearts of his people, the people for whom he labored so hard and unselfishly. He leaves an heritage to his family brighter and more to be valued than gold. He was an honest man, the noblest work of God.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, during the brief period since I entered this body three years ago, the grim reaper has claimed a heavy toll from the ranks of my fellow Members.

To those who doubt the assertion that the duties of a legislator are not only arduous and exacting but destructive to life, I have but to mention the fact that in the short space of less than three brief years 26 Members of the two Houses of Congress have passed away to convince them of their error. This heavy quota of mortality is out of all proportion to the rank and file engaged on the firing line—greater, indeed, than vital statistics can show in either the Army or Navy in time of peace, or from the wear and tear due to the mad struggle for existence in any other field of human endeavor.

Surely, when 5 per cent of our body, supposed to be in the full vigor of physical health and mental efficiency, succumb in such a brief period of time, we must look for some other cause than ordinary deterioration. That this cause is in many instances overwork—a conscientious sacrifice of self upon the altar of duty—a review of the appalling mortality among our Members must convince us.

Conspicuous among those who have gone to premature graves as victims of the work to which they have consecrated their lives for their conscience, their country, and their constituents is the name of my colleague, the late Representative S. A. RODDENBERY, of Georgia.

His death, which occurred at his home in Thomasville, Ga., on September 25, 1913, was so recent and so sudden that there are few, if any, here to-day but who will find difficulty in realizing that he is no longer among us. His presence in this Chamber was so constant and regular in the brief time that he served his district in Congress, and his personality so familiar, that we all recall him as of yesterday—a personality so simple, so frank, and so winning as at once to endear itself to all with whom he came in contact on both sides of the Chamber. With what a shock came the wholly unexpected news of his sudden breakdown and lamentable death.

As I speak these words it seems incredible, impossible, that he is no longer here. As I look in vain for his familiar face and form in his wonted place and realize, alas, that he has left us forever—as the consciousness slowly dawns upon my senses that he is not, a sense of utter helplessness overwhelms me and fills my sorrowing heart with anguish supreme.

O, Mr. Speaker, the task that I essay, the sweet privilege that I share with others in attempting to pay loving tribute to the life and character of my departed colleague, surpasses me. No feeble words of mine, no panegyric, however adorned in conventional language, however decked and garlanded in the choicest wreaths of rhetoric, can adequately express the profound sense of personal loss which I feel for my friend who has passed to that—undiscovered country from whose bourn no traveler returns.

In his untimely taking off this Chamber has lost not only one of its foremost and most useful Members—and that assertion I venture without fear of contradiction; not only has his district, his constituents, and the State of Georgia been deprived of a Representative of whom they were justly proud, but I have lost a friend, a friend who can not be replaced.

Can storied urn or animated bust,
Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath?
Can honor's voice provoke the silent dust,
Or flatt'ry soothe the dull, cold ear of death?

His seat has been filled in this body by a capable and able man; the quota of Representatives from Georgia in the National Legislature is full, and his name no longer appears on the official rolls; the ground, insatiate and inexorable, has closed forever over his mortal remains, blotting from view all save his memory. But, in my heart, as in the hearts of all who knew and loved him as a devoted husband, a tender and indulgent father, an affectionate brother, a loyal, faithful friend, he yet lives, as he shall always live—in memory, ever green.

It seems superfluous to delineate the character of this man to you, who sat with him, as I have, in this Chamber; to you who knew him as I did in life. It is like attempting to paint the lily. But there may be some, perhaps, who did not know him so well, and to them I speak.

In the words of Marc Antony, mourning for his friend, the great Cæsar, let me say:

This was the noblest Roman of them all.
He only, in a general, honest thought
And common good to all, made one of us.
His life was gentle, and the elements
So mix'd in him that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world, "This was a man!"

And I may, too, add with Hamlet:

In my mind's eye I see him still.
He was a man, take him for all in all,
I shall not look upon his like again.

The character of RODDENBERY was one of singular sweetness and purity, as his nature was of simplicity, directness, and conscientious adherence to his high ideals of truth and duty. Aye, duty! That is the keynote of his whole character. He set duty upon a pedestal, above every other purpose in life. He made it his lodestar and followed it to his death. He was a martyr to duty and died at his post—as much so as any soldier who ever gave up his life to his country upon the battle field.

Straining his frail physique beyond its limit in endeavoring to give utterance to the vehemence of his pent emotions, expressed in the many eloquent and remarkable speeches delivered during the three sessions of the Sixty-second Congress, in which I sat with him, his physical powers were overtaxed, and his sudden, startling breakdown came, followed by his all too premature death.

Death, the grim destroyer, which always loves a shining mark, overtook him in the full vigor of his wonderful mental energies and the high noon of his usefulness. His mind and heart—the spirit within him—were too great for the frail body which cramped his great soul. But when the dread summons came, he answered bravely, simply, as he had lived; he broke life's bondage with firm hand and yielded up his spirit to his Maker who gave it with the same calm courage and fearlessness that he always displayed in life. In refusing to quit his post, although knowing full well that it meant death for him to continue, he displayed a sublime fortitude and steadfast resolution. This is the highest type of courage, the supremest test of bravery. Faithful to his ideals, to his convictions, and to his purpose, he sacrificed himself upon the altar of duty.

Of such a fate have men in dungeons dreamed,
And with the vision brightening in their eyes,
Gone smiling to the faggot and the sword.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe in elegiac eulogy, in mortuary panegyric, in fulsome praise of the dead, though custom has established and sanctified it as a necessary ceremony. I believe in strewing some of the flowers which adorn our devious paths through life along the trail as we go by, that their sweetness and fragrance may rise, not as funeral incense in the death chamber, to hang heavy and suffocating around the sable trappings of dissolution and decay, unbreathed by him to whom their tribute is a mockery, but to be culled—if only a modest daisy growing beside the highway—and handed to the wayfarer as he journeys along to sweeten his travail and fatigue. I believe, with that great preacher, Talmage, that a japonica in the living hand is better than chaplets of heliotrope and immortelles entwined about the marble brow of the dead.

A rose to the living is more than sumptuous wreaths to the dead;
In filling life's infinite store, a rose to the living is more,
If graciously given before the hungering spirit hath fled:
A rose to the living is more than sumptuous wreaths to the dead.

But, unhappily, we are deterred by the conventions of intercourse, a false conception of modesty, or embarrassment, from awarding to the deserving, during life, the laurels and posies justly due them, and wait until death has sealed their lips and closed their ears forever to toss our bouquets and breathe our benisons.

Could SEABORN ANDERSON RODDENBERY, alive, sit in this Chamber to-day and listen to the oratory and rhetoric expended in singing his virtues, he would doubtless blush with becoming modesty and deprecate these eulogies which we, his erstwhile colleagues and associates, strive to pay to his memory. And yet, I firmly believe, there is not one word uttered that is not heartfelt and sincere; that would not have been said of him living. But, oh, the pity of it that these poor words of praise are reserved for his funeral odes; that he passed away without knowing the estimate placed upon his character by his fellow man.

Yet he looked for no praise and asked none, other than the approval of his own conscience, which had ever been his mentor and whose signet has ever been his guerdon and his goal.

If there is a man in this Chamber, an auditor within the sound of my voice, who was RODDENBERY'S enemy, who did not respect, admire, and honor him in life, he did not know it; and I am certain whereof I speak when I make the assertion that no Member of this body has passed away since I have been in Congress who is more sincerely and universally mourned than my late colleague.

Elected to the Sixty-first Congress in February, 1910, to fill the unexpired term of his predecessor, Judge Griggs, from the second district of Georgia, he was successively reelected to each of the two succeeding Congresses without opposition.

A quiet man of unpretentious and unassuming demeanor, he plunged at once into the great arena of political strife and turbulency. Like the Roman gladiator of old, a very paladin of virile energy and inspired zeal, he hurled himself, with broadsword and pennoned lance, into the forensic forum. From the day that he took his seat until that when he was forced to take to his bed, unconscious, his voice was heard and his influence felt in committee and in debate. A very whirlwind, a firebrand of eloquence and oratory, his words, sentient with virile force and strength and pulsating with the ebullition of feeling which called them forth, rang through this Chamber as few others have done in every cause in which his convictions were aroused and enlisted. Few others have ever been listened to with more rapt attention than RODDENBERY. He has harangued the House from both sides of the Chamber, for, in advocating the principles which he championed, he has gone across the great aisle, taking his stand among those of the opposition and speaking to them from their own vantage ground, as did St. Paul to the men of Athens. Nor did he spare his own party where he thought it wrong and deserved censure. Now that he is gone, his influence and aid will be missed and his loss deplored by his political friends and foes alike, for when we battle we love a foeman worthy of our steel.

God give us such men! A time like this demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and ready hands;
Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office can not buy;
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men who have honor; men who will not lie;
Men who can stand before a demagogue
And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking;
True men, sun crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty and in private thinking;
For while the rabble, with their thumb-worn creeds,
Their large professions and their little deeds,
Mingle in selfish strife, lo, Freedom weeps,
Wrong rules the land, and RODDENBERY sleeps.

RODDENBERY has gone, and with him is stilled forever a native eloquence and a fervid tongue, attributes of the genius of reformers of all ages, with which men, possessed of his God-given power of oratory and lofty inspirations, have charmed the world and molded the destinies of nations. Enlisted in a righteous cause, as his was ever, these weapons have become the levers of great political ends, like those of Hampden and Cromwell, who like RODDENBERY were tribunes of the people.

The field of his activities was as wide and varied as the restless spirit which inspired him. Immediately after his graduation he accepted and filled the chair of languages and mathematics at the South Georgia College. He was married at 21 years of age to Miss Johnnie Butler, who survives him and has been the helpmate and partner of his remaining two decades of life, sharing his successes and encouraging and assisting him in his endeavors.

The same qualities which so distinguished him here made him a leader in his community and section. His rise at the bar and his reputation as an able and forceful lawyer were rapid, continuous in progress, and certain and conspicuous in achievement. It would be out of place here, even had I the time, to recount these achievements.

Within the limits proper for these remarks it is as difficult a task to speak in reasonably adequate terms of RODDENBERY'S services in Congress as it is to attempt to do justice to his enviable traits as a man.

He was a lovable man, and he was greatly beloved on both sides of the House. He was honest, simple to a fault. His attention to duty, his fidelity to his trust, to his duty as he saw it, his capacity for hard work, his tireless energy and industry, and his official and personal integrity all impressed themselves upon his fellow Members; and, at the time of his death, he was becoming familiar to the public at large through his fiery speeches. He was the uncompromising foe of extravagance in the Government and of every form of corruption. Of everything that could benefit the people at large, and particularly the great agricultural classes, he was a spirited champion. It was no affectation in him that he loved the common people—he was of them, united to them by bonds of blood and association. It was with him an instinct.

There can not be the shadow of doubt that in his death he was a self-immolated martyr to his duty as he conceived it. He was conjured by his family and his closest friends to let up in his work and cease his strenuous speeches which were, all too plainly, breaking down his strength, none too vigorous. He steadfastly refused to heed the warning. He remained at the helm and died with his face turned to windward and his hand clutching, with nerveless fingers, the spokes of the wheel.

Mr. Speaker, throughout Georgia there was universal sorrow when he died, and a great concourse of his fellow citizens, some of them coming from a long distance, attended his funeral and stood at his bier to pay loving tribute to him whom they had honored. He sleeps under the hills of his native State, beneath a wilderness of flowers. In laying this poor wreath upon his grave, in paying this tribute to the memory of him I loved in life, I feel how utterly inadequate is its expression to his worth.

He was a man—

I shall not look upon his like again!
Peace to his ashes!

Faithful to his ideals, RODDENBERY yielded up his useful life, yet he did not die in vain. The grandest examples which have descended to us from the pages of history, sacred as well as profane, are those of the early Christian martyrs and the more modern scientific reformers who have surrendered their lives upon the altar of sacrifice, the silent heroes who have suffered martyrdom for principles, who have died at their posts of duty, as RODDENBERY did. No better tribute can be paid to his memory than is contained in these two words—Death and Duty.

Dead at his post of duty!
What finer eulogy? All the boast
Of pomp and glory seem but idle breath
Beside the calm, quiet dignity of Death!
Where Death and Duty meet
Is found solution most complete
Of all life's problems; 'tis enough—
Dead and at his post!

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I can not hope to pay just tribute to the memory of Georgia's brilliant son, whose untimely death we so much lament, but with the thousands of patriotic citizens who loved him I come to breathe for a moment the sweet fragrance of the flowers he has left behind and to lay upon the sacred altar of his fame my words of admiration and approval.

A little more than 44 years ago SEABORN ANDERSON RODDENBERY was born in the district which he so ably represented. Born of humble but noble parentage, he caught his first inspiration 'mid the hills and flowers of Decatur and Thomas Counties. His indomitable will and courage early attracted the attention of the public, when, practically unaided, he fought his way from the furrows in the field to the halls of the General Assembly of Georgia, at the age of 21 years. His public service as a State legislator was able and brilliant. He only served one term, declining reelection, and turned his talents to the schoolroom, where the impress of his exalted character is found and exemplified to-day in the noblest and best citizenship of southeast Georgia. During this devoted service to the youth of his country he studied law, which profession he soon graced as an able counsellor and brilliant advocate. He was soon elevated to the bench of the county court of Thomas County, where his clear and forceful knowledge of the law and judicial opinion soon stamped him as one of the ablest jurists of his great State. His impartial rulings and clear opinions on the bench have contributed much to the noble profession to which he was so much devoted and which he so much loved. After four years of devoted service on the bench he declined reappointment and returned to the active practice of his chosen profession. He served as mayor of the beautiful city of Thomasville for two terms and was afterwards president of the Board of Education of Thomas County. His public service in all these positions of trust and honor was characterized by consecrated and devoted purpose. The grand old Commonwealth of Georgia loves and reveres the blessed memory of ANDERSON RODDENBERY.

His brilliant speeches as the peerless advocate and champion of prohibition are immortalized in her sober and courageous manhood, in her tender, pure, and Christian womanhood. But the people of Georgia are unselfish, and being a generous and benevolent people we share the rich and priceless virtues of our noble son with the Nation and with the world. As a Member of this House my association with this distinguished scholar and statesman was all too brief, but we can not understand the ways of an all-wise and unerring Providence. The weak and frail body of Mr. RODDENBERY could no longer sustain and support his yet unconquered will and giant intellect, and while many of us realized for months before the end that he could not live, yet when the news of his death was flashed throughout the country we were not prepared to receive it. His physicians and friends had advised and begged him to stop and rest, but his restless spirit could not be still. He died a martyr to duty, true to his trust, true to his country, and consecrated to the God who gave him life. He was a man of fixed purpose, deep conviction, and unbounded courage. He was absolutely fearless in debate, yet kind, courteous, and considerate of those who differed with him on public questions. Well may the youth of his country follow and emulate his example. ANDERSON RODDENBERY is no more. His "voiceless lips" can no longer champion the cause of humanity and right. "O thoughtless speech that calls thee dead." Educator, brilliant lawyer and jurist, statesman, and patriot, your tired form has lain down to rest, but while you sleep the tender and sacred memories of our friendship and affection shall live on, and the sovereign people of your beloved State shall keep watch eternal o'er your rich and priceless contribution to her patriotic and nobler citizenship.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I feel it my duty as a friend of the late Mr. RODDENBERY to speak one word of tribute to his memory on this occasion. My acquaintance with him began when he entered this body during the Sixty-first Congress. During the Sixty-second Congress my seat was immediately in front of his and we became close and intimate friends. I want to say that, in my opinion, few men, and I may safely say no man, has entered the House of Representatives since I have been a Member of it who has taken such rank and gained such universal respect and confidence among his fellow Members in so short a period of service as did Mr. RODDENBERY. It is a well-known fact to all of us who were here in the Sixty-second Congress that the question on which he established his reputation and demonstrated, perhaps, his greatest ability was an exceedingly unpopular one, namely, opposition to private pension bills. A large majority of the House was against him. Few Members of the House on either side had any sympathy with the great fight he made in opposition to these private pension bills and a large majority violently opposed his views and position in reference to these bills. As was said this afternoon by a Member on the other side of the Chamber, I believe that his position and opposition to these measures was misunderstood. I want to say that, knowing him as I did and enjoying his full confidence, I believe his position in regard to these measures was misunderstood not only by Members of the House but by the country at large.

Mr. RODDENBERY often said to me privately that he defied anyone to show where he had ever said one word against a needy and deserving Federal soldier receiving a pension. I believe an analysis of his speeches in these great debates on that question would fully justify that statement. He hated pretense and he hated fraud. He did not like to see a man of wealth or a man holding a high salaried position receiving a pension from the Government. He did not like to see pensions given to deserters. He did not like to see those whose record did not justify a pension under general laws given a pension by the special favor of Congress, and hence he scrutinized carefully every item in these omnibus bills and boldly criticized those items that he considered without merit.

If you recall his criticisms in these debates, he would show that he was objecting to particular cases, and he would detail the facts at great length in order to justify his position. His every effort was in the face of opposition, and independently of what any man might think he dared to oppose them and did oppose them with such matchless skill and ability that he finally brought the attention of the House and the country to his masterful tact and skill as a debater and to his superb ability, and in the end he convinced all of his sincerity, honesty, and integrity of purpose, and gained the confidence and respect of men on both sides of the Chamber.

I happen to know Mr. RODDENBERY's views on other matters, and he was equally zealous on every question that involved a principle. He stood for the right as God had given him to see the right. I want to repeat what has been said by others preceding me, that he was honest not only morally but intellectually, and he had upon all questions the courage of his convictions. He yielded to no man his judgment, however high in authority that man might be, and it mattered not to him whether opposition to his views came from members of his own party or the opposite party. When convinced he was right, he was as firm and immovable as some vast mountain whose towering peak extends into the clouds and stands serene in its solitary grandeur.

Those were the qualities that gave him rank in this body and that peculiarly fitted him to a great service in this House—high moral courage, courage to stand for his conceptions of right, whatever those conceptions may be. This courage S. A. RODDENBERY possessed in as high a degree as any man that it was ever my pleasure to know. And yet, withal, he was a man of genial disposition. He stood for the principle. He never became angry at an antagonist. He stood for his own high ideals, and he defended those high ideals with a matchless eloquence that is remarkable even in this Chamber.

I want to say in conclusion that I loved and admired him, and I felt impelled by a sense of duty to pay this humble tribute to the memory of a true friend.

[Mr. BARTLETT addressed the House. See Appendix.]

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE WILLIAM HENRY WILDER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the second order of the day.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, Ordered, That Sunday, February 8, 1914, bet set apart for addresses upon the life, character, and public services of Hon. WILLIAM H. WILDER, late a Representative from the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions:

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 408.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. WILLIAM HENRY WILDER, late a Member of this House from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished public career the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I am not so fortunate as many who will follow me on this occasion as to have enjoyed an intimate acquaintaince with my predecessor, the Hon. WILLIAM HENRY WILDER, but I know that what I shall say will voice the opinion and judgment of my constituents, who knew him well and who appreciated his ability and his service to them in this House.

WILLIAM HENRY WILDER was born May 14, 1855, at Belfast, Me., where he remained until he was 11 years of age, when his parents removed to Massachusetts. What education he received in the schools came from the great university of the common people, the public school.

During the first years following the removal of the family to Massachusetts he worked on a farm in the summer and attended school in the winter. His knowledge of machinery was acquired in factories at Gardner, Mass. At the age of 17 he went into business for himself, following the paint trade and lines connected therewith, and remained an employer of labor until his death on the 11th of last September.

But for years he desired a larger field of endeavor, his purpose being to go west, but at the solicitation of friends he was induced to remain in Gardner, and the result was that the oil-stove business, which now forms an important part of the manufacturing life of that town, was established there.

Mr. WILDER acquainted himself with every feature pertaining to it, supervised and directed the improvements with such diligence that for a period of more than 20 years not a year elapsed that at least one patent was not issued to him, he having taken out more than 50 in all. His father, Jonas P. Wilder, himself a mechanic, was the inventor of the first sidehill plow, originally devised for plowing on a sidehill, now familiarly known as the swivel plow.

After a short period of depression in the oil-stove business the Central Oil Gas Stove Co. was organized in 1890, with Mr. WILDER as treasurer, and with factories located at Gardner and Florence, Mass., Greenwich, Conn., and Jackson, Mich., and with warehouses at Boston, New York, and Chicago. The volume of business aggregated more than three-quarters of a million dollars a year, and more than five hundred men were employed. He succeeded in carrying these various interests through the panic of 1892 to 1894, but because of some differences arising in the management which Mr. WILDER and his friends could not adjust, an assignment was made in the fall of 1895. This disaster Mr. WILDER opposed, feeling it to be wholly unnecessary. He was thought up to this time to have a competence, but this disaster left him without a dollar when he was 40 years of age and with $50,000 of his own debts and even a larger amount that he had indorsed for those who were cooperating and working with him. He was urged by many of his closest friends to go into insolvency, but, refusing to take their advice, he ultimately paid one hundred cents on every dollar of indebtedness, although before he was able to pay anything the interest had added nearly half as much more.

In 1897 Mr. WILDER brought out the famous free-level oil-stove patents, the first being applied for in April of that year, and it is now being successfully manufactured in Gardner, Mass.

When 45 years of age, Mr. WILDER took up the study of the law, in order that he might engage in the practice of business and patent matters before the United States courts. He gained admission to practice in these courts and afterwards identified himself with a firm of patent lawyers in this city. In subsequent years he became an expert in corporation, bankruptcy, patent, and general business laws, placing many business concerns that were in a precarious condition in good financial status. While he is best known for his activity in the business world as a man of action, he was also a man of sound thinking, as was displayed by his ready grasp of the currency question.

On April 15, 1908, Mr. WILDER addressed the House Committee on Banking and Currency on the subject of the Aldrich bill, the invitation to do so coming from Senator WEEKS of Massachusetts, then a Member of the House, and at that time one of the House members of that committee. Mr. WILDER was practically the only layman who addressed the committee, and his address was subsequently issued by the committee in pamphlet form. About that time Mr. WILDER wrote a diagnosis of the conditions then existing, entitled "My Notions on the Currency Question," which was thought to clearly explain the situation as it then existed.

The next year he went abroad to study the monetary systems of Germany and Austria, visiting all the important centers and carrying letters of introduction to leading bankers, but he returned convinced that the banking systems of the Old World were inapplicable to this country.

I am confident that WILLIAM H. WILDER would wish that no extravagant words of praise or fulsome eulogy should be spoken on this occasion. He was a plain-spoken, honest, sincere, and modest gentleman. Human though he was, he valued appreciation, as we all value it, but it is well at a time like this to recall those qualities in a man which cause men to admire him—absolute honesty, inflexible integrity, unswerving loyalty, and high purpose.

One of his leading characteristics was his supreme optimism. He manifested it in every relation of life. He believed in mankind, and that it was forging forward rather than backward. He believed in the men who were associated with him in business, political, social, religious, and fraternal activities, and therefore men believed and trusted in him. He was a man of firm and positive convictions, having strong views on all subjects. Although a Republican and a firm believer in the policies of that party, and believing in party organization as necessary to the proper administration of the Government, he was nevertheless broad and liberal in his views, and his respect for the opinions of others was such that he entertained no ill will nor unkindly feeling toward any man who might differ with him or who belonged to another political party. Of him former Congressman Samuel W. McCall of Massachusetts says:

I can speak from the point of view of one who served with WILLIAM HENRY WILDER during his first Congress. His health was in a critical condition when he became a Member of the House, and I suppose continued so throughout his service, but his energy and capacity were such that he did a great deal of work and did it very effectively. He had a command of business and financial subjects, and his speeches upon them while he was a Member were valuable contributions. I remember that when one of the tariff bills—I think the one upon the cotton schedule—was reported to the House from the Committee on Ways and Means it was arranged that I should open the debate for the Republican side. I promised Mr. WILDER some of my time. He seemed anxious on account of his health to get the matter off his mind at once, and I yielded to him to lead with the opening speech, and it was a good one. He was invited by an association of gentlemen in the banking business in Pittsburgh, Pa., to deliver an address upon the currency question, which he did, and did effectively. I had an opportunity to hear him do political speaking upon the stump, and he showed readiness and force and made a strong impression. He was a thoroughly loyal friend.

Such is the tribute of one of his colleagues on the Massachusetts delegation. How brief the fruition of our lamented friend's hopes in the Halls of Congress. But it was not his custom to complain at fate or misfortune. He was a firm believer in the eternal fitness of things. He sought to be faithful in all things, and so it was, when fatal disease placed its relentless hand upon him and he was warned that the time of his departure was near, he met his fate with fortitude and serenity.

To his family and intimates his attainments in public affairs and his success in business were overshadowed in the love he had for his family and those nearest and dearest to him.

His ability to serve others was one of the strong traits of his character. He was indeed "a friend in need" to many. His life was one of service in the highest and best sense of the word, and in these days of unrest and discontent he remained an optimist.

There may be seen in Sleepy Hollow Cemetery, down in historic Concord, in Massachusetts, inscribed in enduring bronze upon the tombstone of Massachusetts's great Senator, George Frisbie Hoar, these words:

Finally, I believe a republic to be greater than an empire, and though the clouds darken the horizon I believe to-day is better than yesterday and to-morrow will be better than to-day.

These sentiments found a ready response in the optimism of WILLIAM H. WILDER.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the sad part of the life of a Member of the House of Representatives is the break in the delegation in our respective States caused by the calling of one of our number from his life of usefulness and duty here to the life beyond the grave. The late WILLIAM H. WILDER, whose memory we recall to-day, passed away September 11, 1913. He was born in the State of Maine, and in early life he removed with his parents to the State of Massachusetts. He knew something of the hardships of life. The numbers, who like himself, only attended school during the winter months are rapidly decreasing. In his early life educational opportunities were exceedingly limited. As a boy he worked on a farm. Whatever money he received for his services, he understood the value of it, for "by the sweat of his brow he earned his bread." Although he lacked a collegiate course of training, he applied himself to the opportunities that were presented to him of obtaining knowledge that gave to him ability to successfully engage in business at an early age. He possessed inventive genius and became interested in many useful patents.

This, together with his environment, arising from his being located in a manufacturing section of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, caused him, when but 29 years of age, to enter business as a manufacturer; and later he organized a corporation known as the Wilder Industries. His history would seem to show more than ordinary activity. To most of men, what he had accomplished up to that period of his career would seem to have been sufficient to have merited a period of rest. But our late colleague only looked forward to greater activities and broader accomplishments. Most of the young men of to-day who are intending to become members of the bar want high-school training, a full course in college, and then thorough education in law before seeking admission to practice law in our courts. At the age of 45 years he studied law and was admitted to the bar. Mr. Wilder was not only familiar with affairs in his own country, but he had been abroad twice and studied monetary affairs, and being a Republican and a protectionist he realized by experience and practical knowledge what advantages had accrued to his district, his State, and the country by the long continuance of the Republican Party in power, and with full appreciation of the advantage which the policy of protection to American industries and American labor had conferred upon his section of the Commonwealth.

He studied the tariff question from the foreign viewpoint in order that he might be enabled to know something which would be of value to him in meeting questions bearing upon the economic discussions in which he then had an ambition to participate.

He was a candidate for election to the Sixty-first Congress, but was not successful in obtaining a seat in this body until the Sixty-second Congress, and he was reelected to the Sixty-third Congress. He was especially equipped to defend the policies of his party, and he participated actively in the debates upon the tariff question.

In addition to his intelligent studies and wise conclusions relative to the tariff question, Mr. WILDER was a thorough student of the money question. He knew the value of money, and he had the ability to accumulate a fair portion of the world's goods. He was an interesting conversationalist, because of his travels abroad, and his experiences at home. He had a strong mind, but physically he was not strong enough to carry out all the purposes he had in view.

The close application to his duties here, and the great strain of continuous service during the hot months of last summer, affected his health unfavorably, and resulted in his death at a time when his usefulness seemed to be of the greatest value to his State, and to the country.

His life, his experiences, and his accomplishments may well engage the attention of the youth of to-day.

They should inspire encouragement and hope to the rising generation. They show that industry, determination, and adherence to definite principles will produce a reward in the United States of America not afforded in any other country in the world.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the occasion that has called us together to-day is one of sadness and deep solemnity. We meet to pay a last and heartfelt tribute to the memory of our late colleague, WILLIAM H. WILDER, who passed to eternal rest in the very prime of his manhood and the full fruition of his usefulness as a citizen and a legislator. The exactions and stress of service as a Representative in Congress afford little or no opportunity for that close intimacy of association, among those from the same State even, which is necessary to a just estimate of the full life and character of a man, and I can only speak of Mr. WILDER as I knew him by public, as distinguished from close personal acquaintance. He was a man of high ideals and indomitable persistency in seeking to attain them. No official act or vote of his was ever prompted or influenced by private or selfish interest. His life had been crowded with business activity before his election to Congress, and he made full use of the intense energy and great ability by which he had forged to the front in the business world in forwarding the interests and desires of his constituents. He was very regular in attending the sessions of the House. In the latter months of his illness it was pathetic to see him summoning all his strength of mind to aid him in repressing the weariness and pain he was suffering in order that he might remain on the floor and discharge his full duty to the constituency he represented. For many months before his failing health compelled him to forego attendance upon the sessions of Congress he denied himself all social relaxation and enjoyments that he might conserve his failing strength for the better discharge of his public duties.

Mr. WILDER was essentially a self-made man. He had no wealthy relative or friend to aid him either in acquiring an education or gaining a foothold in business. His education was only such as a boy who worked on a farm summers could get in the country schools during the winter sessions, and the meager instruction ceased when he was but 16 years of age. He had ambition, determination, and perseverance; qualities which, united with a willingness to work and work hard, are certain to bring success in whatever line of effort their possessor may employ them. Lack of higher education or want of opportunity at hand were no handicap to such a man as our late colleague. Utilizing to the utmost such knowledge as he had, he went boldly into the world and fought his way steadily upward. Few successful men of his time have entered upon so many and such varied lines of activity, and it is a remarkable tribute to his versatility that after 28 years of unremitting toil he should study law, be admitted to practice, and thereafter utilize his newly acquired profession in the furtherance of his business as a manufacturer. Success as a business man or as a professional man is generally the limit of attainment of most individuals, but with him it was success in both. Nor did the rare qualities of his fertile brain end there, for he shone as an inventor as well, no less than 50 patents having been issued to him in the course of his busy life, each and all of them covering some useful conception of his busy brain. That he was imbued with a broad, human sympathy for the toiling masses from and through whom he had risen is amply and splendidly testified by the fact that during the 38 years he had been an employer of labor not a strike, lockout, or disagreement marred his relation with those he employed. His career is a splendid illustration of the possibilities open to every boy in the land, and no greater incentive to rise above environment could be given a boy than to be taught the story of his life. Truly may it be said of WILLIAM H. WILDER that his life was not lived in vain, that his influence and deeds all made for the uplift and betterment of his fellow man, and his record of achievement both as a private citizen and a public official is one of which his constituents, his many friends, and his bereaved family may well feel proud.

Mr. THACHER. Mr. Speaker, WILLIAM H. WILDER was born in 1855 in Maine. A brief glance of his life will show his characteristic energy and industry. When he was 11 years old his family moved to Massachusetts, and he worked as a boy on a farm, attending school in winter. When he was 17 he went into mercantile business, and at the age of 29 he went into manufacturing.

During all his life he was a keen student and mastered not only his own business, but he found time to study carefully a wide range of subjects. When he was 45 years of age he began, what is somewhat remarkable for a man of that age, the study of law, and was subsequently admitted to the bar.

He found time to study some of the great economic questions of the present day, including the currency and the tariff. He visited Europe in 1909, 1911, and 1912, not as an idle tourist, but he found opportunity both for recreation and for study and reflection. During all of these years he was the head of a successful and large manufacturing business. In 1910 he turned his energies into a new field. He became the Republican candidate for Congress in the fourth Massachusetts district. He was elected to the Sixty-second and Sixty-third Congresses. While he was in Congress he served his constituents faithfully and conscientiously. His health began to fail in 1913. Sustained by his courage and pluck, he continued hard at work during the early part of the extra session of 1913. In spite of his indomitable energy and will, he continued to fail. He died on September 11, 1913.

This is the brief record of the life of an active, busy man. He was no idler; he believed in work. From his early days, when he worked as a boy on a farm, to the time when he sat in Congress he was always hard at work. He worked not for himself, but he showed his devotion and loyalty to everything that tended to the welfare of his town, State, and country. I understand that Mr. WILDER'S religious affiliations were with the Congregational Church, a church whose history has been closely interwoven with that of New England since our colonial days. Whatever were his religious views, I think that he must have believed that to whatever creed one may belong the best way to practice one's religion is to live a useful and active service toward our brother man and our God.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, just as the beautiful summer season was drawing to a close and the somber, melancholy days of autumn were at hand death came and struck down WILLIAM H. WILDER in the full bloom of life, before the hoary blasts of the winter of life had come to weaken, to impair, to chill, and to deaden. The strong, vigorous, self-reliant, and aggressive man that for nearly half a century had made his own way, buffeted every storm, overcame many obstacles, and had arrived at a place of power and influence in the business world, honor and distinction in the political field, and of esteem and respect in his town, his State, and the Nation, fell. A family grieved at the loss of its head, its guide, and its protector; a town mourned at the departure of its leading citizen; a State regretted the loss of one of its best Representatives; and a Nation over its great Capitol lowered the American flag, respectfully marking his passing. And to-day in this hallowed chamber of the National Legislature the associates and colleagues of the deceased Congressman gather to pay their tribute of respect to the memory, the life, the character, and public services of Hon. WILLIAM H. WILDER.

Many great men have come to Congress from the State of Maine. That State has played an important part in many fields of human effort. Her sons and daughters are a strong, vigorous, wholesome type of American citizenship. It was in this splendid State, in the city of Belfast, on May 11, 1855, that WILLIAM H. WILDER first saw the light of day. The first 11 years of his life were spent there. Shortly after the close of the Civil War his parents moved to Massachusetts. The first year that he came to Massachusetts he began working, first on the farm during the summer months and then wood chopping during the winter, getting what schooling he could during the autumn months of the year. This schooling ceased altogether as far as the country school was concerned when he was only 16 years of age. The following year, when only 17 years of age, he embarked in business for himself and continued as a constantly increasing employer of labor up to the date of his death. The boy who afterwards was to head a great business concern laid the foundation by mastering a trade. He became a painter and engaged in this business in its various branches. No employee worked harder than he; none was more courageous or more desirous of pleasing.

One phase of his work was the painting of church spires, and this sturdy young man knew no fear or faltered not at any task, however hazardous it might be, that came to him in his line of business. It is needless to say that the boy who became a toiler at the age of 11 found himself at the age of 29 the head and owner of a successful business. But, as he prospered, step by step, new fields beckoned to him and he had about made up his mind to dispose of his business and strike out for the West, where the ambitious and adventurous 30 or 40 years ago directed their footsteps. But Gardner, where he had been building a business, a name, and reputation, was beginning to recognize the latent powers of this young man and his friends there induced him to remain and engage in a new business, offering greater opportunities and a wider field of development.

A partnership was formed and a new oil-stove company entered the field. It was at this time that the inventive brain of young WILDER began to revolutionize this business. It was at this time he launched forth in the field where were to be witnessed his greatest achievements. The history of our country reveals the fact that the brain of the New Englander, or Yankee, as he was called, was indeed an inventive one. It has been said that "necessity is the mother of invention." New England, blessed in many ways by God, offered not many opportunities with rock-bound coast and stony soil for the teeming thousands that began to people its hills and dales to eke a living from its bosom. Other ways must be found and the inventive genius began to manifest itself.

Time forbids and the occasion does not justify a further digression into a field that has brought fame, wealth, happiness, comfort, and prosperity not alone to her people but to all the people of the civilized world. Let it suffice that the ingenuity, industry, and enterprise have placed that great section of the country in the very van of American States.

Nature had been kind to WILLIAM H. WILDER. It gave him a great, big body and big mind. With tireless energy he engaged in the new business, and his brain began to fashion in form inventions in the business that afterwards brought fame, influence, wealth, and prosperity. Not a year elapsed but what some invention of his creative brain was patented, and up to the time of his death some 50 had been granted to him by the Patent Office. Others more familiar may trace his business career in detail. One may speak of the crashing of his great enterprise to the ground, its rehabilitation and manly settlement of all obligations, dollar for dollar. Another may tell of the disastrous fire that wiped out his plant and of his mighty task of rebuilding without a day's cessation of business. Some may tell of fights to preserve the integrity of his patents, but all will unite in saying that his business was a great success, honestly conducted, independently maintained, and to-day flourishing and growing, although the creative brain and guiding hand are stilled in death.

Fourteen years before his death Mr. WILDER took up the study of law, and he pursued his studies with all the diligence, regularity, and success that characterized his other efforts. He was admitted to practice in the various United States courts and also in the District of Columbia. He felt keen satisfaction over his success in the law, because it was obtained in a study snatched from the busy hours of days crowded with a constantly expanding business.

But Mr. WILDER had another side that has been manifesting itself for some years. Always interested somewhat in public affairs as they pertained to his town, his State, and the Nation, he now turned his mind, his thoughts, and his ambition toward service in the Congress of the United States. His struggle, his efforts, and his final success in being elected was only another indication that "Where there is a will there is a way," and that despite every obstacle this man of fixed determination, inflexible mind, strong conviction, and ceaseless energy was chosen to represent a great constituency in the very heart of the old Bay State.

His achievements here find eloquent recognition from those who were long associated with him in this chamber. They form a bright page in the legislative annals of this great body. His service covered one term and several months of another. His extensive business dealings, his grasp of the great business questions of the day, his wide reading and studies pursued in many fields, his journeys to every section of this country and to the great cities of the old world, his ready sympathy, wide experience, the tireless industry of the man, and the confidence of the people of his district made him a strong and impressive figure in the House.

His successor has covered many phases of his business, social, political, and religious life. I speak of him as an associate, as a neighbor, almost, and as a distinguished citizen of Massachusetts. I knew the strength of his lance, the quality of his metal, the aggressiveness of his nature, the bigness of his heart, the generosity of his impulses, and the sturdiness of his character. I grieve over his departure. I sympathize with his family, his town, and his State. The memory of that beautiful Sabbath afternoon will never be effaced from my mind as I saw surrounding his bier the humble and the lowly, the rich and the powerful, the captain of industry and the laborer in the factory, the business associates, the brothers in the societies in which he held membership, the representatives of the town, of the Commonwealth, and of the Nation. I heard ringing in my ears the words of the clergyman as he spoke feelingly, simply, and truly of this son of Gardner. I saw the tear-stained faces and felt the glow of affection and of sympathy that pervaded all, and I believed that this good and faithful servant who had laboriously toiled upward and onward over the rugged road of life had done the Master's work well and faithfully and had gone to a reward that passeth understanding.

May his struggles, his sacrifices, and his achievements prove an inspiration and encouragement to American youth, to the end that this great Republic may continue its splendid mission for good for all the people in all the years that are to come.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, the Hon. WILLIAM H. WILDER, the Representative in Congress of the Third Massachusetts District, died September 11, 1913, in the 59th year of his age. It becomes my duty and privilege, at this memorial service of the body of which he was an honored Member, to refer to the loss which the House has sustained in his death.

Mr. WILDER was a man nearly twice as old as I am—indeed, his son and I were in Harvard together; and I had never met him until last April, when I came to Washington for the special session of the Sixty-third Congress. It may, therefore, for these two reasons seem somewhat presumptuous for one so much younger, without even the excuse of long acquaintance, to add his voice to the many voices which, with so much better right, are to-day referring to Mr. WILDER's career.

But from the first day of the session Mr. WILDER seemed to extend to me an almost paternal interest. Time after time, day after day, we would sit side by side during the long debates, and he would, out of the fullness of his experience, tell me something of his scheme of life, something of what he had undergone, and something of his aspirations for the future.

He did not hesitate to speak of the fact that he was afflicted with an incurable disease, and that the end was certain to come at no very remote period, whether it might be a few months, or perchance a few years, in the future. Time and again, during the luncheon hour, I have watched him eat but a small fraction of the amount which his hearty appetite would have permitted him to enjoy. Yet, in thus subjecting himself to the insistence of his physician, I never heard him utter one word of complaint. And this characteristic, relatively unimportant in itself, I like to think was typical of the whole character of the man. I have referred to his relating to me some of the incidents of his career; I always fancied that in what he said he was seeking, though very guardedly, to convey a suggestion which the older man knew would be or ought to be useful to the younger. I remember, for example, that one day when we were chatting a third Member of the House came to us and told us gleefully how he had succeeded in procuring for himself, through methods perhaps a trifle sharp, but yet certainly not dishonest, a larger share of a certain distribution than would have come to him otherwise. When the man left us alone, Mr. WILDER said to me, "ROGERS, that sort of thing does not pay; I have been watching the men who do it for a good many years, and I never saw one yet who did not suffer as a result, both in his own moral fiber and in the esteem with which he was regarded by his fellows."

No Member of the House appeared more rugged in health than did Mr. WILDER; powerful of figure, sturdy in speech as in appearance, no man was a truer product of the best in our splendid New England civilization. Through the redistricting of Massachusetts in 1912 it chanced that 18 of the towns which, as part of the fourth district, Mr. WILDER had represented in the Sixty-second Congress, are now a part of the fifth district, which I represent. As I went up and down those communities a year and a half ago, it was a pleasure to observe how generally Mr. WILDER was known by their citizens; and it was a greater pleasure to learn how universally he was respected—aye, even loved—by every element. His simple strength of character, his unaffected facility in meeting all sorts and conditions of men endeared him in an unusual way to his constituents. This circumstance and the fidelity with which he had cared for the wants, great and small, of his people made the task of his successor indeed a difficult one. And yet the service has been an inspiration, too.

The last time I ever saw Mr. WILDER in life was one beautiful balmy afternoon last summer, when, as I was passing through the park on the banks of the Potomac, I saw him and his wife, to whom he was devoted and of whom he loved to talk, sitting there in the sunshine. The peace of his expression and the wave of the hand with which he greeted me as I passed will be the memory of the man which I shall cherish through the years.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, as it was my good fortune to be associated in our work as Members of the House with WILLIAM HENRY WILDER, who was and is and ever is to be our friend, and in honor of whose memory we are met to-day, I have craved permission to speak briefly of his life and character.

His was a mind and disposition well suited to the varied problems with which a legislator must deal and the countless duties that are cast upon him daily and almost hourly while the Congress is in session. He thought in a straight line, refused to be carried off his feet by every shifting wind of doctrine that chanced to blow, and finally reached a conclusion which he was ready and willing to defend against every challenge.

His life work had given him an ideal preparation for his labors here, for here we face duties that require us to have practical knowledge of industry and commerce, of the farm, the store, the factory, the mine, of human nature, of human conditions and conditions inhuman, of law and the history of its evolution, and of practically everything that affects the Republic or its people. Only a myriad-minded man could be equipped for every such duty, but many men have by wider experience been fitted for a wider range and larger fraction of their duties here. Mr. WILDER was one of those thus more widely schooled and more fully equipped.

He was born at Belfast, Me., May 14, 1855. In 1866 he moved to Massachusetts, the State that learned to honor him and which he honored. Until he was 17 years of age his life was spent on the farm and in school. He then gave himself to mercantile pursuits until he reached his twenty-ninth year. He next devoted himself to manufacturing and invention, more than half a hundred patents having been granted to him for the products of his own genius, skill, and patient toil. He studied law and became learned in the profession, his special interest in that line of work leading him to become an expert in patent questions, proceedings, and litigation.

I doubt not that it was his special knowledge and peculiar qualifications for the work that led to his appointment as a member of the Committee on Patents, on which he served during the period of his membership in the Congress. In no other capacity could he have been intrusted with greater responsibility or rendered a greater service. It was President Lincoln who said that our patent system is intended to "add the fuel of self-interest to the fire of genius." He who has studied the question most knows best that the American patent system lies at the very foundation of American industrial and commercial supremacy.

As a member of the same committee, having no special knowledge of the patent system or of the questions pending before the committee, but having a lively appreciation of the immense importance of the entire subject, I found him able and willing to give patient and sympathetic aid. I felt secure in his knowledge and in his sound judgment. I owe him much and have repaid him nothing.

Mr. WILDER was a man of broad vision and culture. His interest ran far beyond the limits of his own employment, profession, or other gainful pursuits in life. In his travels he visited the countries of the Old World, studying many things of general interest, among which were the tariff, banking and currency, and the rising and falling value of the dollar. He returned to renew his studies again and again.

That he had mechanical taste and skill is evidenced by the fact that he held a license as a steam yacht's master. In the fraternal world he found his chiefest pleasure in the ancient and honorable order of Free and Accepted Masons, in which he was advanced to the rank of Knight Templar. Though born too late in the century to be a soldier in the Civil War, he was an honorary member of the Grand Army of the Republic.

In all the relations of life he found his rightful place and measured up to the demands of every duty. As husband and father he was true to all the members of his household. Sons and daughters were given to him. They survive him and have great reason to be proud of the life and character of the father whom they have loved and lost a while. A widow mourns his death, but her sorrow for his death must be tempered by deathless gratitude for the fine qualities and rich fruitage of his life.

As a thoughtful and earnest man we would expect to find in him definite convictions on that subject which is the most universal fact and experience in human life—religion. He had his convictions. In the matter of church affiliation he was a strict and devoted member of the Congregational Church. He found it in his heart, and he took the time to assume the responsibilities and perform the labors of the superintendent of his Sunday school. I know no finer employment for a broad-minded, big-hearted, busy man of the world. I know of no finer man for such a task. The earnest, thoughtful man who faces the members of his Sunday school once each week may become of advanced years, but he can never grow old. The last time I had the pleasure of a conversation with him we sat at lunch together, and from a short preliminary talk of the questions likely to be involved in the bills before our committee drifted out into a free and frank discussion of things great and fundamental in life, of its deep and final philosophy, and of the inevitable end.

He was even then within the tightening grasp of a malady that is catalogued as fatal. He was standing consciously in the presence of the probability of impending death. In that presence he was serene and unafraid. He did not yield himself a willing subject to enfeebling fears. He rather took good counsel of his hopes and courage. He rejoiced in the possibility of prolonged life with its continuing privilege of efficient and satisfactory service. I knew, less from what he said than from the manner of the saying, that he had long been accustomed to live in the conscious presence of two worlds, the world that is and the world that is to be. A sojourner in the one, in love with its joys and its beauties, its privileges and its duties, he had learned that his birthright was citizenship in the other, and that he could find no abiding place until he had entered into his goodly heritage. For such a man life holds all of joy that is possible to mortals. He is grateful for life every day, and yet he is able to contemplate death without a shudder and meet its issues serene and satisfied. When I try to fathom the thoughts of such a man, I am not tempted to believe that he had solved the mystery of life or the mystery of death. I am constrained to believe that he accepted both mysteries without the dreads and doubts that mystery so often casts into the minds and over the very souls of men less able to grasp an idea or discern a truth.

When a thoughtful man contemplates the vaster universe revealed to us by telescope and microscope, he can not but adopt as his own the sentiment of the German scientist who said to the young men in his class:

Gentlemen, if the universe and our planet ever come to be governed by a wisdom, science, and penetration on a plane no higher than we mortals are capable of understanding and mastering, then I would most fervently wish to be out of it and in a safer place.

And so I fancy that our brother accepted the mystery of life and the mystery of death as assurances that the universe is in safe hands. Only the Infinite can govern the infinite, and the Infinite must ever be a mystery to finite minds.

To the man of clear and disciplined mind, such mysteries but furnish occasion for the firmer faith, for which he thanks God, and takes courage.

From the mere hints I have given as to the scope and qualities of the mind, character, and life of WILLIAM HENRY WILDER, it is manifest that his was a full, well-rounded character, and that he lived the abundant life. For what he was and what he did we shall all hold him in reverent and hallowed memory. Inasmuch as there came to me a distinct personal advantage from his friendship, and there flowed into my life by virtue of our association a finer inspiration and renewed courage, I shall ever bear to him a lively sense of deathless gratitude.

Mr. PETERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, WILLIAM HENRY WILDER was a Member of this House in the last Congress. The delicate state of his health was the occasion of much concern to all his colleagues, but I for one did not fully realize the danger which overshadowed his service here, and his untimely death was a great shock to me.

WILLIAM HENRY WILDER was the type of man who arouses in Americans the greatest praise and admiration. In boyhood he experienced the hardships of hard manual work on a farm in the western part of our Commonwealth, and he was limited in his opportunity for self-education to a short attendance during the winter months at a local school.

When a young man he became interested in mercantile life and developed a considerable business as the result of his own energy and perseverance. His ambition to increase his store of knowledge was a lasting characteristic, as witnessed by his study of law when a man of 40 and his successful admission to the bar, which resulted in a wide practice.

To the American mind one who has a thirst for knowledge and who is also successful in the business world needs but one further attribute to command its complete admiration. We esteem highly the man who is strong enough to open the way to knowledge and who can at the same time make himself a factor in our business or professional world. Our admiration has never failed to be doubly stimulated when that same person proves himself to be a good citizen—one who shows a real patriotic interest in the problems of his own day and who unselfishly works for their solution. WILLIAM HENRY WILDER possessed all these qualifications, and his selection as Representative in Congress by the district in which he lived and worked is indicative of that high esteem in which he was held by those who were most intimately acquainted with him.

Though his service in this body was comparatively brief, his uprightness and integrity were evident to all his associates here. His high sense of right and his unselfishness and his clear judgment were well known to all. His kindliness and sincerity made him a friend whose loss it is not easy to forget.

It is meet that we should come together here in this place to pay our highest tribute to his memory.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Speaker, it is always a sad and solemn occasion when we come together for the purpose of commemorating the deeds of a departed colleague and friend. WILLIAM HENRY WILDER, late a Representative in Congress from the State of Massachusetts, was born in Belfast, Me., May 14, 1855, and removed to Massachusetts at the age of 11 years. He worked on the farm during the summer and attended the public schools in the winter until he was 17 years of age. He then entered the mercantile business and remained in that business until he reached the age of 29 years. He then engaged in the manufacturing business in the city of Gardner, where he lived until his death, on the 11th day of September, 1913. It was due to his energy and genius that the manufacture of oil stoves, which is an important part of the manufacturing life of the city of Gardner, was established and successfully carried on there.

Mr. WILDER was elected to the Sixty-second Congress on the Republican ticket by the narrow margin of 130 votes and was re-elected to the Sixty-third Congress by more than 3,000 plurality, which shows that his services in Congress were appreciated by his constituents, and therefore his popularity was increasing. While Mr. WILDER was a stanch, and, I might say, partisan Republican, and a man of strong convictions, yet he accorded to others equal sincerity of conviction, and his Republicanism and partisanship were not of an offensive character.

At the beginning of his service in the House he was, at his own request, assigned to a place on the Committee on Patents. We served on the committee together during his entire service in the House, and I found him to be a most lovable and companionable man. He was very much interested in the work of the committee, and I do not recall that he missed a single meeting of the committee during his entire service until his health began to fail and he was admonished by his physician that he must take a rest.

In passing, I might say that Mr. WILDER, in addition to being a successful business man, was also a lawyer and inventor. During his career as a manufacturer and inventor he had granted to him by the Patent Office more than 50 patents of utility. He was really an expert in patent matters; hence was a very valuable member of the committee.

Mr. WILDER did not speak often, but what he said attracted attention because of his wide experience, thorough study, and sincere conviction regarding the subjects discussed. In the later years of his life he traveled extensively, studying financial and other economic questions, and he discussed these questions on the floor of this House and in private conversation in a very entertaining and interesting manner.

He came from sturdy New England stock and was early in life thrown upon his own resources, and by indomitable energy and determination his efforts were crowned with success. He had the confidence of his constituents and the admiration of his colleagues, and I shall long remember the many kindnesses and courtesies shown me by WILLIAM HENRY WILDER.

He was cheerful in disposition and optimistic in his ideals, and was at all times ready and willing to render a service to his friends or the country. Those who knew him intimately for a great many years testify that his home life was ideal, and that he was a kind husband, loving father, and a generous friend. The world is better because of his life and example.

MR. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, in the death of Hon. WILLIAM H. WILDER, late Member of Congress representing the Third Massachusetts Congressional District, our Commonwealth and our country have lost a man whose devotion to duty was of the highest order.

Mr. WILDER was a Member of the Sixty-second Congress and had entered upon his duties in the Sixty-third. Unfortunately his health began to fail during his first session and he continued to lose strength constantly until the time of his death.

It was not my good fortune to have intimate acquaintance with Mr. WILDER until the beginning of the Sixty-third Congress, but from that time on until the end of his life we became closer and closer friends and it was my honor to receive from him many of his confidences, both as regards his public service and his private cares.

From the rather intimate acquaintance so formed and developed I was able to learn reasonably well the aims, purposes, and ambitions of the man.

Although at this time I am called to speak in a certain official way of Mr. WILDER, and so to give testimony as to his faithfulness to his trust, it is, however, more as a personal friend that I would pay my tribute to his memory.

He told me at one time and another of his experiences in life, with particular reference to his career in public service and his experiences in commercial undertakings. In the latter line he was conspicuously able to show to those who had to do with him, and to onlookers, the metal of which he was made.

Good fortune smiled on him at times and again misfortune overtook him. In all cases he proved himself the man.

In the sunshine of success he was generous almost to a fault, as many benefited by his hand could bear witness. In the shadow of adversity he carried his own burdens with credit to himself and in justice to all.

Mr. WILDER was a man of many parts and excelled in various fields of study, investigation, and occupation.

At the hour when all seemed to be ready for him to perform a public work into which he might bring his unusual talents and display his exceptional energy, we learned of his last illness and his death.

Mr. WILDER was a modest man who made no vulgar parade of his attainments. Those who knew him best admired him most, but unfortunately, like many another gifted beyond the ordinary lot of man, he was retiring and overmodest.

In his home town he was strong and beloved. At the House of Representatives of the United States those who had come to know him appreciated him and now those of us who are left hold his memory in high esteem.

He has left to his family, and particularly to the sons who succeed to his commercial undertakings, an inheritance of great value and an example of a man who in the hour of peace was tranquil and dependable and in the hour of trial courageous and righteous.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, it was my great privilege to serve in Congress with the late WILLIAM HENRY WILDER, and it is my sad duty to-day to offer a brief tribute to his memory.

Mr. WILDER was born in Maine, but moved with his parents to Massachusetts as a boy, and there received a public-school education. He became a citizen of Massachusetts and early entered a mercantile life, and by intelligent and unwearying toil rose to the head of a large and prosperous business. Unlike many men of affairs, he was continually educating himself in matters outside his profession, and found time, among other things, to study law. He was admitted to the bar when close to 50, in itself a sufficiently remarkable action.

He was elected to Congress in 1910, and was even at that time in very indifferent health; but his indomitable will overcame physical discomfort, and he soon became an honored and useful Member of the House. He made a name for himself both on the floor and in committee, and when the time came for reelection was urged to run again, though his health by that time was very bad. But his desire to serve the public was stronger than any personal consideration, and he entered the campaign and was reelected.

It must seem to us that had he lived there was for him a long career of service to the State and a life full of years and honors; but an all-wise Providence had otherwise decreed, and in the prime of manhood Death's hand was laid upon his shoulder. He did not flinch; his courage was as high in that supreme moment as at any time in his life, and, with a smile on his lips, he answered, "I am here."

Then mourn we not beloved dead,
Even while we come to weep and pray;
The happy spirit far hath fled,
To brighter realms of endless day.
Immortal Hope dispels the gloom—
An angel sits beside the tomb.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, my first meeting with the late Congressman WILDER was a very informal one. I happened to be passing through Gardner, Mass., and desired information about roads to adjoining towns. Stopping in front of a manufacturing plant, I interrupted a man busily engaged in the directing of a group of men at work about the premises. He took especial pains to give me the information I desired, and I proceeded on my way with the kindliest of feeling toward the man willing to stop important work to furnish casual information to a total stranger. Surely it would have been the last thought to have come to me that within a very few years it would be my painful duty to announce to the House of Representatives the death of this gentleman with whom I was destined to be associated as colleague.

Later the same spirit of friendiness was displayed when visiting Washington I came on this floor for the first time before taking my seat as a Member. Congressman WILDER sat beside me and endeavored to give me all enlightenment he could as to method of procedure and duties of a Congressman. During the few months we were associated together as Members the same kindly spirit was ever present, showing that it was a natural trait of Mr. WILDER's to be of assistance to his friends.

His success in life can be regarded as another example of the development of American manhood through honesty of purpose, strict attention to duties of business, and fair dealing with his associates. Without ostentation he was ever alert to the needs of his district and faithful in the discharge of his obligations to his constituents. By study and travel he fitted himself for special work wherein his service was of great value to his own district and the Nation. Others who were longer associated with him than I have spoken of these services.

The great respect in which he was held by his intimates and neighbors was shown at his home in Gardner, where we attended the last sad rites. The entire town seemed anxious to show its love and respect for its distinguished citizen. An impressive funeral oration, a spacious home filled with mourners, and the streets lined with sympathizers on that beautiful autumnal day all bore testimony of the love and respect felt for him. Surely Representative WILDER was a typical example of the best of American manhood, and his widow and family have the consolation of this monument to his memory.

[Mr. GILLETT addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, in accordance with the resolutions heretofore adopted (at 3 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, Monday, February 9, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

MONDAY, February 9, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou hast not hid Thyself from the eyes of any of Thy creatures. Even those who are in darkness and superstition may know that which can be known of God, which has been revealed to all men by the things that Thou hast made. God of this day, the sunlight, the world, Thou hast revealed Thyself; and in all that Thou hast revealed Thou hast made known the great plan of life. We find our place in God's creation in the light of the revelation of God's larger plan, the plan that takes in all men, that expresses itself in love and providence and grace.

Grant us this day that high place where Thou wouldst have us to serve, and with the grace that Thou dost give to us may we serve faithfully and well. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I send to the desk a communication addressed to the Senate, and I desire to make a brief statement with reference to it. I ask that the communication may be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

FEDERAL WOMAN'S EQUALITY ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., February 9, 1914.

To the honorable Members of the United States Senate:

We are petitioning you to give your most earnest consideration and, if possible, a favorable report on joint resolution No. 1, giving the right of franchise to women.

We have petitions to 84 United States Senators from those who gathered at Gettysburg to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of that great battle. Those men who met there, both from the North and South, and shook hands at the bloody angle, realize the worth of the women of the country in time of need. It is not the number of names that we are giving you, although we might have had 40,000 signatures from the 50,000 present, if we had had the time to secure them. We ask the Senators to consider the quality of these names, as they represent the opinion of men who have passed the age of three score and ten.

Respectfully submitted.

Mrs. CLARA W. MACNAUGHTON.
Mrs. ANNA HARMON, Secretary.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in reference to that communication I desire to say that the ladies whose names are subscribed to it handed to me this morning the petitions referred to, which were addressed to 44 Senators and inclosed in 44 envelopes. So far as I have been able to do so, I have delivered the envelopes with the inclosed petitions to the Senators to whom they were addressed. I have a few that I have not been able to deliver to Senators because of their temporary absence from the Senate.

Inasmuch as Senate joint resolution No. 1 will soon come up for the consideration of the Senate, it was a great pleasure for me to be permitted to deliver these petitions to Senators, and I am sure that when they come to be considered they will receive the earnest attention of the Senate in connection with the arguments which will be presented in favor of the joint resolution. I desire to present the petition from citizens of Oregon which was given to me with the letter which I have submitted to the Senate and ask that it lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition will lie on the table.

JUVENILE COURT BUILDING.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have a letter from A. Leftwich Sinclair, chairman of the committee on law and legislation of the Washington Chamber of Commerce, transmitting a series of resolutions adopted by that organization in favor of an appropriation for the construction of a new building for the juvenile court of the District of Columbia. This matter is a very important one, and I am personally fully persuaded that an appropriation such as is contemplated ought to be made. I simply ask now that the letter may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 7, 1914.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: As chairman of the committee on law and legislation of the Washington Chamber of Commerce, I beg to invite your attention to the following resolutions which were recently adopted unanimously by the chamber:

Resolved by the subcommittee on law and legislation of the Washington Chamber of Commerce appointed to consider the question of recommending that the chamber of commerce indorse the movement on foot in the District to secure from Congress an appropriation sufficient for the erection of a juvenile court building, that we recommend to the full committee the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved by the committee on law and legislation, that there is an urgent need for a juvenile court building in the District of Columbia, and that the chamber of commerce should, without delay, vigorously recommend and urge Congress to appropriate a sufficient sum for the erection of such a building at the earliest practicable date;

Resolved, That it is the sense of this committee that such building should be located in a quiet neighborhood, far removed from any other court, with suitable accommodations therein for the detention of children, and ample grounds for the recreation and care of the children.

The old, dilapidated building now occupied by the juvenile court is entirely inadequate and is a disgrace to the National Capital, and it is earnestly hoped that you, as a friend of the District, will use your influence to secure an appropriation by Congress for the erection of a suitable building for this important tribunal.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours,

A. LEFTWICH SINCLAIR,
Chairman, etc.

ADDRESS BY HENRY LITCHFIELD WEST.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have the manuscript of an address delivered by Henry Litchfield West, former Commissioner of the District of Columbia, before the du Pont Civics Class, of Wilmington, Del., on the National Capital. It is a very interesting contribution to the literature of the National Capital, and I submit it simply for reference to the Committee on Printing with a view to its being ordered printed as a public document if the committee thinks it worthy of publication in that form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The address will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. WALSH was, on his own motion, excused from further service upon the Committee on Canadian Relations.

Mr. MYERS was, on his own motion, excused from further service upon the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATIONS BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. BRYAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 12235, the fortifications appropriations bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12235) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with, and that the bill be read for action on the committee amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will proceed to read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Armament of fortifications," on page 3, line 17, after the word "arsenals," to strike out "$450,000" and insert "$900,000," so as to make the clause read:

For the purchase, manufacture, and test of mountain, field, and siege cannon, including their carriages, sights, implements, equipments, and the machinery necessary for their manufacture at the arsenals, $900,000: Provided, That the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, is authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise incur obligations for the purposes above mentioned not to exceed $300,000, in addition to the appropriations herein and heretofore made.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the Senator who reported the bill kindly tell us briefly why such an increase is made in the House appropriation?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Texas is not heard in this part of the Chamber.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask for a brief explanation as to the large increase in this particular item.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, if Senators interested in the bill and in the reasons which guided the department in estimating $900,000 for siege guns, and so forth, will read the House hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations of the House they will find about this situation. There are now manufactured and appropriated for by Congress 753 of these guns. The plan under which the Chief of Ordnance has been working contemplates 1,292 guns, which he considers necessary for an army of half a million men. Of these 1,292 guns 696 are to be supplied to the militia. The provision for the supply of those will come in the Army appropriation bill. Five hundred and ninety-six guns under that plan properly come under the fortifications appropriation bill. For the Regular Army there are now 216 guns appropriated for and for the Volunteers 312 guns.

It should be stated that the appropriations carried in this bill deal with the seacoast fortifications and also with the mobile artillery, the branch which has to do with the Regular Army and the Volunteers.

I think the hearings before the House committee will demonstrate that it was not contended by the members of the committee that the amount of cannon asked for is out of proportion if we are to have an Army of half a million men or to be prepared to put into the field an army of that size.

With this preliminary statement in answer to the question of the Senator from Texas, I read from page 15 of the House hearings:

The regular mobile army in the United States should be organized into three infantry and two cavalry divisions with an aggregate war strength of about 75,000. To make this force efficient will require 54 batteries, or 216 guns. With the hearty cooperation of the governors of the States, the militia can be organized into 12 infantry and 5 auxiliary divisions with an aggregate war strength of 292,000. This force will need 174 batteries, or 696 guns. The aggregate of these two forces is 367,000, or, approximately, two field armies short of the force of 500,000 men. These two field armies will require 168 guns apiece, or 336 guns. Our foreign garrisons have 68 guns. We will need, then, for this force of 500,000 men in the United States:

For the Regular Army, 216 guns.
For the militia, 696 guns.
For the two field armies of Volunteers, 312 guns.
For our foreign garrisons, 68 guns, or a total of 1,292 guns.

(The guns given above for the two extra field armies have been reduced by 24 guns, because the Regular Army at present has one regiment of heavy field artillery.)

To summarize this: For the Regular Army and Volunteers we would need 596 guns; for the militia, 696 guns.

Appropriations have already been made for 300 guns for the militia, and for 453 guns for the Regular Army and Volunteers.

I may say that they are 300 short now.

Lower down on the same page it is said:

If the 59 batteries, or 236 3-inch guns, now in the hands of the militia were sent to war, these guns would require 438,000 rounds of ammunition to make them efficient.

So it is claimed by the Chief of Ordnance that there is now 28 per cent of the guns authorized for the Regulars and Volunteers.

I will state to the Senator this is why this amount of $900,000 is asked for.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is that the amount estimated for?

Mr. BRYAN. It is the amount estimated for.

Mr. SHEPPARD. And the committee, after listening to the evidence adduced in the hearing, allowed only $450,000?

Mr. BRYAN. That is correct. Reading from page 109 of the hearings, Gen. Crozier, the Chief of Ordnance, says:

From the funds I am asking for in this estimate I expect to procure six batteries of 3-inch mountain howitzers, which is the smallest field gun that we use, at a cost for the six batteries of $212,586. In addition, I expect to procure two batteries of 4.7-inch howitzers at a cost of $256,758; also two ammunition batteries for 3-inch guns for $183,190, and one ammunition battery for the 4.7-inch guns at $163,800, which four items add up $816,334.

Then, to that total we add approximately 10 per cent for reserve parts, making $83,666 and bringing the sum total to $900,000, which is estimated for.

Mr. SMOOT. In that connection I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that Gen. Crozier also says in the examination, from which the Senator has read:

Now, as we have brought out, the $900,000, in addition to the $300,000 authorization asked for, is $300,000 to meet old obligations and $600,000 of new money.

I want to call the attention of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] to the fact that $300,000 of this $900,000 is for old obligations incurred, according to the testimony of Gen. Crozier.

Mr. BRYAN. Gen. Wood, the Chief of Staff, in the hearings also made a brief statement, giving the number of guns at base or in arsenals and also the total requirements. I will read that into the RECORD for the benefit of the Senate.

At base or in arsenals, 3-inch mountain howitzers on hand, 425; required, 850; 3-inch steel guns on hand, 928; required, 1,856; 3.8-inch field howitzers on hand, 624; required, 1,080; 4.7-inch field howitzers on hand, 540; required, 1,080; 4.7-inch field guns on hand, 672; required, 1,344; 6-inch field howitzers on hand, 504; required, 1,008.

I will state further, Mr. President, that it is not intended by this bill—and it ought not to be accepted by Senators who vote for this bill—that the appropriation here will complete the requirements. It is divided into three equal installments. It seemed to the Senate Committee on Appropriations that perhaps the House did not give sufficient consideration to this request, in view of the fact that it takes time to manufacture these guns.

I will say further that when this scheme is completed the number of large guns in proportion to the troops will be smaller than that in any other army of a first-class power. The number per thousand men under this plan will 3.16 guns, and there is no other army that has so small a proportion as that.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator is basing that statement on the idea that the Army is to have 500,000 men?

Mr. BRYAN. That is the assumption.

Mr. SHEPPARD. As a matter of fact, how many men are in the Army at the present time?

Mr. BRYAN. There are in the Regular Army about 76,000 men.

Mr. SHEPPARD. What, then, is the necessity for providing sufficient guns for an Army of 500,000 men?

Mr. BRYAN. Because it is supposed, Mr. President, that it is the duty of the Government to be prepared for war. It is expected that if war should come with a first-class power this country would call into service not fewer than 500,000 men. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the War with Spain, while there were less than 20,000 men engaged around Santiago, there were nearly a quarter of a million men enlisted. Of course, all these guns will not be in action at once; but we do not know at what points they will be in action. It seems as though it would be the part of unwisdom to put troops in the field under a call, and then not have the necessary heavy artillery to protect them.

Those, in brief, Mr. President, are the reasons why the committee increased the appropriation as provided for in the bill as it came from the other House and made the appropriation equal to the estimate submitted by the department.

I wish to say, further, that the Secretary of War appeared before our committee and stated that in no instance was a single estimate made with a view of having it cut down, but that he had made the estimates upon the actual necessities. It goes without saying that the men who are employed by the Government, from the Secretary of War on down, ought to know more about the real necessities in case of war than members of the committee would be expected to know.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not desire unnecessarily to consume any time, but I wish an opportunity to vote against what appears to be so palpably an improper increase of the appropriation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, in view of a publication which I read in the Washington Post of this morning, I think this is a matter of very grave importance. I understand from the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] that the purpose of the provision is to supply adequately the needs of such an army as we might unexpectedly be required to call into the field.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I should like to read from the House hearings a comparative statement given by Gen. Wood.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

Mr. BRYAN. I read from page 13 of the House hearings:

The Russian Army to-day probably has, roughly speaking, 6,000 guns at least, and the French Army carries something like 4,800 guns. The German Army has probably over 5,000 guns. We are asking an allowance of guns about in line with that of the Bulgarian and Servian Armies. The Russian Army had in 1911 in their entire army 554 batteries of 8 guns each, or 4,432 guns, plus a large reserve, and they are increasing their field artillery. The French had in 1911 in their entire army 725 batteries of field guns of 4 guns each, or 2,900 guns, plus large reserves. The Germans had in 1911 583 batteries of 6 guns each, or 3,498 guns, plus large reserves.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the publication to which I referred a moment ago appearing in the Washington Post of this morning stated that this Government was thoroughly unprepared for war; that working under high pressure it would be something like two years before there could be produced sufficient munitions and materials in order to supply an army such as we would have to call into the field. If that be true, Mr. President, it seems to me we are confronted by a very serious situation.

In the conditions which exist in this country, I take it that it would not require any great length of time to muster into the service a very large Army, and therefore I do not see any necessity for a big standing Army. We can secure volunteers under our militia system very rapidly, and it would take but very little time for us to bring our fighting force up to the requisite number; but, if it be true that, even if we are able to get men into the field, there is such a deficiency at present in the necessary munitions of war as has been indicated, and that it would require as long a period of time as is indicated in the article to which I have referred, working under high pressure, to secure ammunition, arms, artillery, and other instruments of war in order to enable that force of men to become effective as a fighting force, it does seem to me that a problem of a very serious character is presented. Whether or not we are going to need this ammunition and these guns, it seems to me, as it requires so long a period of time for us to get them in case we should need them, that we ought to take precautions to provide for them. I am not speaking for the provision or against the provision, but I am calling attention to what struck me, upon reading this article, as a very serious situation in connection with our preparedness or our unpreparedness for war in case war should be suddenly thrust upon us.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator who has just addressed the Senate referred to an article, which I have also read, appearing in a morning paper; but there is a great deal before and behind that. Years ago our coast defenses amounted to scarcely anything; we had little in the way of emplacements and cannon. The necessity for coast defenses was seen, and during, I think, Mr. Cleveland's first administration there was appointed a board, called the Endicott Board, which took up the whole matter of the coast defenses of this country. They estimated that it would cost some $125,000,000 properly to defend our coasts. That amount has been since enlarged by the extension of our coast and by the fact of invention bringing out a higher class of projectiles and of guns, so that it has required an estimate of about $190,000,000 to provide properly for our coast defenses. The Endicott Board was succeeded by the Taft Board and necessary additions and enlargements were made.

With the kind of weapons with which we have provided them our coast defenses, I might say, are practically impregnable, so far as water craft are concerned, but they are open in the rear or inland side to the attacks of a mobile army. A foreign power could land troops by means of boats or rafts anywhere along our Atlantic or Pacific or Gulf coast and come around in the rear of our coast defenses, as we did in attacking the Spanish forts, unless our defenses are supported with a mobile army, and unless that mobile army is provided with sufficient arms and ammunition. If an attack should be made upon the Pacific coast, we could not immediately transfer ammunition and arms from the eastern coast or, vice versa, from the west to the east. So there should be a proper insurance in the way of an adequate supply of both arms and ammunition near these various points.

I have kept close watch of this matter ever since the organization of the Endicott Board. We have all of the time been short; in fact, when we had the war with Spain, if the Assistant Secretary of the Navy had not—as he and everybody else admitted, without exact and full authorization—engaged a very large amount of powder and ball before war was declared, we should have been, when that war was declared, everything in the way of military supplies then being contraband, without sufficient powder or small arms to amount to anything for the needs of the army called into service.

We must have a supply of ammunition and a supply of guns sufficient at every point of possible attack to last a limited length of time. To my certain knowledge, and according to the reports submitted by Army officers right through from the lower ranks up to the Secretary of War, and which have been verified, there have been times when on the Pacific coast, if there had been war or had been an attack, we would have exhausted all the powder and ammunition we had there in 30 minutes' continuous firing. We would have been in that condition repeatedly.

I submit, Mr. President, that after expending over $140,000,000 on our coast defenses, after providing an Army, after providing a plan, through the militia and in other ways, to increase that Army, provision for movable guns and for an ample supply of ammunition is the all-important item, and is in the nature of insurance. It matters not how many guns we may have if we have not ammunition; it matters not how many big guns we may have on the coast if we have none of the lighter kind for the mobile army to move from point to point. I am only sorry that the amount named is as small as it is. The sum proposed to be appropriated is in the interest of economy and is in the nature of insurance. This appropriation is not in the nature of an annual expenditure. It is simply to provide these guns and this ammunition as surplus or storage stock, ready for use when called to arms. We are now making smokeless powder which, so far as we know, is almost indestructible until used. Powder made in 1900 is still apparently as good as when made. Hence, to expend the money we are about to expend—and the item for which I hope will pass as amended—is the insurance, the all-important item in the defense of this country.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I wish to say that I think he will understand my remarks as being very much in sympathy with the proposition he is making.

Mr. WARREN. Entirely so. I felt that the Senator was justified not only in that but in having his attention called to what had preceded that. This is not merely the report of the present Secretary; it has been the report of various Secretaries, repeatedly, in the past.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator a question. I must confess that when I read this statement in the paper this morning I was amazed to find that a great government like ours was in such a situation as the statement indicated. Suppose we should become involved in a war and should have to call into the field, say, four or five hundred thousand men. That would not be a big army if we got into trouble with a power of any size. The Senator is very familiar with this subject. I have heard him discuss it upon the floor frequently and with fullness of knowledge. Does the Senator agree with the statement that at present we are without ammunition to supply such an army except for a very limited time, and that it would take one or more years, working our factories at their full capacity, to secure a sufficient supply of ammunition to furnish an army such as we would want and such as prudence would require that we should bring into the field?

Mr. WARREN. Undoubtedly, undoubtedly. While I am discussing that matter, Mr. President, let me make a further statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator agrees, then, that that is a true statement of the conditions that exist in this country?

Mr. WARREN. Absolutely. I want to say to the Senator that it has been a matter of humiliation to me many a time to know how near to bedrock we were; to know that, with all the money we are expending for these emplacements and all the money we are expending for the big guns to put on them, we have nothing to fire in the guns. Let me add here some official figures.

The Endicott scheme of fortifications, as modified and revised to date by the Taft Board, called for:

In continental United States	$159,982,534.43
Already appropriated to date for same	122,812,548.86
For insular possessions	30,177,536.71
Already appropriated to date for same	19,579,967.88

We are manufacturing to-day a large proportion of our projectiles and of our powder. In the olden times black powder was used, and it was manufactured entirely by private concerns. It is since my poor service on the Military Affairs Committee and the Appropriations Committee of the Senate that the idea of making our own powder has been considered and carried into execution.

In the establishment of the powder mill for the Army the proposition was to start a mill which, employing it only eight hours a day, would give us some proportion, if not all, of the annual consumption in time of peace, because we wanted to reduce the price if we could, and we have greatly reduced it. It costs but little more than half what it formerly cost, by reason of natural reduction in cost and the Government's efforts. We wanted to find the way of making the best powder that could be made through our own channels and exact the same quality from the private makers. We wanted factories so that we could put on three shifts and work 24 hours a day when necessary, and also have a central plant that could be enlarged quickly in case of war, and have enough expert men so that enough green or new men could be taken on to enable the Army plant to supply a very large proportion of the powder in time of conflict. At the same time it was thought best not to make a mill big enough to make all the powder required, but from time to time to buy certain amounts of the manufacturers, so that they might keep their mills and machinery, so that in time of war we could depend upon them as well as ourselves.

The erection of that powder mill and its conduct has been a perfect success. We have helped to reduce powder from above $1 to somewhere lower than 60 cents a pound. The Navy has followed the example of the Army and has constructed a mill. To-day some of those who opposed the building of the mills are the most enthusiastic in favor of having the Government manufacture all its own powder. I do not agree with that, because I feel that we ought to have the insurance of the large private concerns that we can depend upon in case of trouble, because, as you all know, the moment war is declared we can not get a pound of powder from any foreign country. It must be all made within our own lines.

Some people believe, as I say, that we should make all that powder. Some people believe that this Nation of Yankees, so called by foreigners, can lick the world. I agree with them. I do not believe we are going to be attacked. I do not believe we are going to have war. We have, however, expended all these millions of dollars to prepare for war. That being done, are you going to refuse the paltry million or two or three millions that are going to be required to perfect the entire system and insure us a supply that would run us along in case of war until our own mills, supplemented as they would be with additions, and supplemented further as they would be with private concerns, could furnish powder fast enough so that we would be relying upon our own resources?

In war nothing is more necessary than powder and field artillery. Why hesitate to build these mobile-army guns, guns that it will take three years to build, when every other army has greatly increased its artillery? The late wars, such as the war between Russia and Japan, show the effectiveness of the mobile army with its artillery. We are away behind all the other countries. We are away behind our own system. We are away behind our own ideals and desires, and it will take, as I say, two or three years to catch up. On the other hand, to think of the great Pacific coast without powder enough to last 30 minutes in case of an attack is an idea that ought not to be entertained even for a moment.

I only wish we had put in the entire amount of $3,000,000 asked for for ammunition, powder, and ball, but as the committee has put in $2,000,000 I sincerely hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, an increase of mountain, field, and siege cannon and reserve ammunition for our Army is no new question. It has been before Congress for a number of years, and I wish to express my sorrow that it has not been favorably acted upon before.

I only wish the committee could have seen their way clear to provide the appropriation of $3,000,000 instead of $2,000,000 for ammunition. In case of war I think it would be next to criminal to find our Army, as we would find it under present conditions, without ammunition to defend the country and to defend their own lives.

We only have $3,500,000 worth of reserved ammunition in the United States to-day for the Armies of the United States. It would not be more than the requirement of a day or two if we were in actual war. I think the $2,000,000 provided for should have been increased to $3,000,000, as asked for by the officers of the Government having this matter in charge.

I can not help thinking we ought to learn from the experience of other countries. We have but a few mountain, field, and siege cannon; very few indeed—I believe about 753. Russia has over 6,000. The French Army has over 4,800. The German Army has nearly 5,000. Even Mexico has more of that class of cannon than we have.

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has well stated that we have been appropriating, for the last 10 or 12 years, nearly $100,000,000 for the building of our fortifications; and yet of what earthly use are they unless we have ammunition and field and siege cannon for our Army? None whatever.

I am in full sympathy with the additions proposed by the Senate, not only for the extra cannon but the additional appropriation for ammunition. I only wish it were $3,000,000 instead of $2,000,000.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I shall support the bill as it came from the House, and shall not vote for any of the increases in this bill, one being half a million dollars, on page 3, and one being $1,100,000, on page 4.

At the present time 65 cents out of every $1 raised by the Federal Government is spent for the purpose of paying the expenses of wars of the past and wars that we pretend we imagine may come in the future.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator believe that if it is a question of the amount of money that is appropriated for preparation for wars, this is the proper kind of an expenditure, to give our Army ammunition, so that in case they did have war they would have something to defend the country and themselves with? If we want to cut down the expense of war, why not cut it down on other items that are not so vital to our protection as these items, for they should be held as an insurance against immediate war, and to give the Army sufficient powder, in case war is declared, to defend the country and themselves?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah, as usual, speaks on this point especially with force and directness. I have so much respect for him that I am almost inclined to respect his opinion, but on this question I do not wholly share his view. I appreciate the wise suggestion he has just made in reference to economy in the manufacture of our armor plate and in the construction of battleships.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. BRYAN. Can the Senator state how many men the House committee contemplated having in the Army?

Mr. ASHURST. I have not the data at hand, but it would seem that an Army of 500,000 men is contemplated.

Mr. BRYAN. I will ask the Senator if it is not conceded in the House hearings that if we are to have an Army of that size this appropriation ought to be made?

Mr. ASHURST. Oh, yes; if we are to have an Army of that size; but it has not as yet been determined. We are not legislating upon hypothesis.

Mr. BRYAN. Does the Senator believe, then, that the Army should not be increased at all outside of the Regular Army?

Mr. ASHURST. Does the Senator from Florida believe the Army should be increased? If so, why; and what nation does he believe is going to attack us?

Mr. BRYAN. I will wait until the Senator finishes, and then I will answer.

Mr. ASHURST. As I was saying, Mr. President, 65 cents out of every dollar which is raised by the Federal Government is used to pay the expenses of wars of the past and wars that we think, or pretend we think, may come in the future. In addition to that, a close and searching analysis of the facts will disclose that since the foundation of the Federal Government in 1789, since its first day's existence as a Federal Government, for every dollar this Government has paid out to promote the arts of peace, the arts of agriculture, and those things whereby nations are subsisted—for every dollar we have paid out to promote the art of construction we have paid out $700 to pay the expenses of wars of aggression and defense.

The Democratic Party during the last campaign charged the Republican Party with gross extravagance in the handling of the public funds.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I notice that the Senator is speaking of the percentage of Federal revenues expended for wars. Of course he has included a great deal that can hardly be called the expense of war.

Mr. ASHURST. Directly and indirectly.

Mr. WARREN. Well, very indirectly.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; very.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator speaks of pensions, among other things. I have in mind the fact that it was the Democratic Party that made the last raise in pensions and increased the pension list some twenty or thirty million dollars a year. I do not charge them with any wrongdoing; but the pensions, amounting to $180,000,000 or $190,000,000, are reckoned in there. The Senator has also reckoned in all of the permanent structures.

If the Senator takes the ground that there never will be war and that we should have no defense, of course what I am going to say has no force. We have, however, expended almost $150,000,000 in permanent things in the way of protection for the country, so that we may not have war. It is an insurance. To be provided for war is an insurance against war. We are still paying pensions for the families of those who fought in the Mexican War, as well as in the Civil War.

So that percentage, so often stated, loses its effect when it is analyzed, and when we get down to the actual expenses of maintaining an army we find that it is nowhere near the percentage stated. While I know the Senator has good authority for the statement, in that it has been made in many places, in order to build up that amount everything is raked in from all directions, including, as I say, pensions in the expense of the Army, and I submit that this is unjust.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator for his suggestion?

I was proceeding to say that during the last campaign the Democrats from the stump charged the Republican Party with gross extravagance, and said: "If you will trust us with the affairs of government, we will be economical. We will not extravagantly spend the public moneys.

Mr. President, if we are going to practice economy now is the time to begin. If we were acting in good faith when we charged the Republican Party with extravagance in their expenditures, let us show our good faith by not eclipsing them in extravagance.

I am not unaware, and no Senator here is unaware, of the fact that there is in this Nation to-day a clique of men who for their immediate gain, for their immediate personal profit, fill the country with alarms of danger and tell us that soon we will hear and see the pomp and circumstance of war. They have battleship armor plate they wish to sell; they have powder they wish to sell; they are patriots for profit only.

While blowing a blast on the bugle of war they meanwhile have a hand in the Public Treasury. Take, for instance, the battleship Pennsylvania.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. Just let me finish the sentence. Take, for instance, the battleship Pennsylvania, and we find respecting that vessel the amount of money extravagantly, yea improperly, paid aggregates $1,600,000 on armor plate alone. It is a good time to economize, and if the Democrats mean to keep their pledges this is the place to do it. I charge here, I charged last May, that the excess on the price of armor plate which went into the Pennsylvania was $1,600,000, and although some men have threatened to deny the truth of that statement its truth can not successfully be contradicted.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator's observations at present seem to be devoted to another branch of service—the Navy—which is not under consideration now. He certainly can not apply such observations to the Army. It is proposed that powder and guns shall be manufactured by the Government for the use of the Army.

Mr. BRYAN. Perhaps the Senator has not read that far in the bill.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, before the bill is finished the Senator will see that this provision is very emphatic and causes all these materials to be made by the Government, with certain minor exceptions.

Mr. ASHURST. I am very glad to know that after so many months of ceaseless hammering the Government now proposes to enter into the business of manufacturing its own powder. For a long time, as was said by the Senator from Utah this morning, the Government paid a dollar a pound for powder, and just so soon as we went into the business of making our own powder the price fell to 65 cents and then to 53 cents, if I am correct.

Mr. SMOOT. There is a limit of 53 cents provided in the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. That is correct. I am glad to vote for any appropriation in reason which will provide for the construction of powder factories and factories for the manufacture of armor plate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Arizona a moment ago called attention to the fact—I suppose it is a fact—that we are spending of the revenues of the Government about 65 per cent for maintaining the Army and the Navy and for other purposes incident to our preparation for war or to discharge liabilities incurred under past wars. Does the Senator think that we are now maintaining too large an Army?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I will reply to that later in my remarks. But the Army should be put to work. The Army should be kept not in idleness, but some of the Army should be used for constructive work, for the building of railroads in Alaska. The employment of the Army engineers in the matter of the Panama Canal has certainly shown that we should have an Army, but not an Army of dissolute idleness.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator think that the enlisted men of the Army ought to be put to work in Alaska building a railroad?

Mr. ASHURST. On that point I have an editorial from the New York American I will read.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Is that the Senator's view of the use of an Army?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I may as well read some excerpts from this editorial now as at any other time. It is written by Mr. Arthur Brisbane, and appeared in the New York American January 4, 1914. It is entitled "Put this old war god to work."

Mr. SUTHERLAND rose.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator, of course, if he wishes to ask me a question.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was anxious to obtain the Senator's view upon the subject as to whether the Senator himself thinks that the enlisted men of the Army ought to be put to work building railroads in Alaska or elsewhere.

Mr. ASHURST. They ought not to be idle.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is not quite an answer to the question I propounded. The question I asked the Senator was whether or not he thought the enlisted men of the Army ought to be put to work building railroads in Alaska, or similar work of that sort.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if I had charge of the matter I would not want to put the enlisted men to work in competition with the labor of the country. We have cheap labor already in competition with the labor of the country. If you put them to work on matters of that kind, you might bring them into competition with the labor of the country, which already has to compete with foreign imported labor.

In answer further to the question I will proceed to read some excerpts from this article.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Before the Senator does that, let me ask him another question. The Senator thinks that the enlisted men of the Army ought not to be put to work in competition——

Mr. ASHURST. No; the Senator did not say that and he does not think that. You can not put words into my mouth, my dear Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I thought that was the statement which the Senator made.

Mr. ASHURST. I am not responsible for defects of the Senator's hearing.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Very fortunately the Senator is not, but——

Mr. ASHURST. I say that in all courtesy.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understand how courteous the Senator is. I understood the Senator to say in the beginning that he thought the enlisted men of the Army ought to be put to work. In reply to another question which I propounded to him I understood him to say that at any rate he was in doubt as to whether they should be put to work in competition with the labor of the country. If the men are to be put to work and not to compete with the ordinary labor of the country, at what kind of work would the Senator have the enlisted men put?

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator's imagination is so fertile he may safely leave it to the domain of his own imagination as to what kind of work they ought to be put to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I thought the Senator was stating a proposition in earnest when he said the enlisted men ought to be put to work, that they ought not to be idle, and I am asking the question in entire good faith. I should like to hear the Senator's view as to what kind of work the enlisted men ought to be put to.

Mr. ASHURST. Does the Senator from Utah think they ought to remain idle?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think they are idle. I think the enlisted men of the Army are pretty busy at the various military posts.

Mr. ASHURST. Doing what?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Being trained to meet necessities whenever they may arise.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly; but I did not want to take the Senator from Utah off his feet. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I was merely going to suggest to the Senator from Arizona, in answer to the question of the Senator from Utah, that it might be that they could be profitably employed in the construction of highways.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In competition with convict labor?

Mr. KENYON. No; but as far as I am concerned, I would just as soon believe that it would not harm the enlisted men of the Army to build railroads in Alaska, and it would be fully as profitable as their drinking tea at afternoon functions.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think the enlisted men are attending the dansants. I wish to ask the Senator from Arizona another question.

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not quite sure whether the Senator thinks the Army is too large or not; but, passing that, does the Senator think the Navy is too large?

Mr. ASHURST. What is the question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator think the present Navy of the United States is too large?

Mr. ASHURST. My opinion of that would not be of any value to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then, let me ask the Senator another question. Does the Senator think that we are spending too much money paying pensions?

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Arizona does not think so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now, those things—the maintenance of the Navy, the building of the Navy to the present dimensions, the maintenance of the Army at its present size, the payment of pensions, and the fortifications we are building—constitute the war expenditures, about which the Senator has been complaining. If all these things are necessary, or the Senator is not able to say that they are not necessary, upon what ground does the Senator complain that we are spending 65 per cent of the revenues of the Government?

In this connection, let me call the Senator's attention to a fact. It is true that we are spending perhaps 65 per cent of our revenues, but the Senator must remember that this is a dual Government. The Federal Government, with its limited powers, is raising revenue and expending it for one set of objects, while the 48 States in the Union are raising revenue and expending it for an entirely different set of objects. The whole war expenditure of the entire country of 48 States and of nearly 100,000,000 people is borne by the Federal Government, while all the States are raising vast sums of money by taxation and expending it for the maintenance of schools and for various other things which have nothing to do with war.

Now, can the Senator tell us what proportion of all the revenues of the United States, including those raised and expended by the various States, is expended for purposes of war?

Mr. ASHURST. I doubt if I ever saw those figures. Of course I have not those figures at hand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator must realize that if the war expenditures of the Federal Government are compared with the total of all the other expenditures of the Federal Government and the total expenditures of all the States for the purposes of government, the amount in comparison fades into comparative insignificance.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator has looked into that, and I have large respect for his source of information and for his integrity of statement. I have no doubt myself there is force in the Senator's figures. There is a disposition many times to charge the Senator or Representative who opposes large expenditures for the Army or Navy as being somewhat unpatriotic. Certainly those Members of Congress who feel that our expenditures for purposes of war ought to be closely scrutinized should not be charged with any lack of patriotism. I would permit no man to charge me with being unpatriotic simply because I scrutinize appropriations and expenditures that have been made or that are about to be made with respect to expenses for national aggression and national defense.

But I will proceed with this article which I have had on my desk for some days waiting an opportunity that I might have it read at the desk or do the Senate the honor to read it myself. I will therefore proceed to read it.

As I said, it is written by Mr. Arthur Brisbane, the talented writer and publicist on the New York American, and it is as follows:

> Earth's "civilized governments" spend thousands of millions annually on war.

I am delighted to see that I have the attention of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am listening to the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST (reading):

> Millions of men are taken from useful work and kept ready to be used as fighting machines.
> Hundreds of millions are spent for fighting ships absolutely worthless to the world except as checks on possible attack.
> Nations live like the armed bandits of olden days, with their minds on bloodshed and battle and their millions spent for murder or preparing for murder.
> The United States could make attack from without impossible, stop immediately all wasting of money and time on Army and Navy, open useful and honorable careers to hundreds of thousands of men, and improve this Nation by putting the Army and Navy to work.
> Before this century shall have ended some one of the great nations will have adopted the plan to be outlined here. The United States should be that nation, and it will be if public men, editors, and, above all, the tens of millions of citizens, will give thought to a simple suggestion.
> The curse of the Army and Navy is idleness. Every intelligent officer will confess that he does not know how to keep his men busy.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield, very cheerfully.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know whether the Senator from Arizona wishes to be interrupted in the reading——

Mr. ASHURST. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts and any other Senator will feel that they may interrupt me at any time on any point or question.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to ask the Senator if he indorses the statement he has just read, that intelligent officers of the Army and Navy confess that they do not know how to keep their men busy?

Mr. ASHURST. In answer to the Senator, I will say that, while I approve the general tone of the article, there are some statements or sentences in it which I might not be able to indorse or approve, simply because I do not have all the information.

Mr. WEEKS. Does not the Senator know that at this time there is great difficulty under present conditions to get men of best quality to enlist in the Army and Navy?

Mr. ASHURST. That is quite true.

Mr. WEEKS. Does he not know or has he not visited sufficient Army posts to know that the schedules of drills and other employment are sufficient to keep men in the service employed more hours a day than is the case in civil pursuits? If that is true, what is the use saying that intelligent officers do not know how to keep their men busy?

Mr. ASHURST. I said once before that while I indorse the tone and spirit of this article, there are also some isolated fugitive sentences in it that I do not approve, and there are other statements in it regarding which I do not have sufficient information to enable me to form a belief on the subject. But I thank the Senator for his suggestion:

> The officers will tell you that men desert because they can not bear the wasted life that produces nothing.
> Why will not this Nation make its soldiers and sailors, its ships, and its highly educated officers, producers of wealth and, at the same time, perfect guardians of the country?
> We have seen what the Army can do in the building of that wonderful canal.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, before the Senator goes any further, will he not permit me to suggest that no man connected with the Army, other than a few engineers, have had anything to do with the building of the Panama Canal? No enlisted man has been employed in the building of the Panama Canal, but simply the men who directed the operations.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator for that suggestion:

> We have seen what the Army can do in the building of that wonderful Panama Canal.
> The Nation faced the task and used the Army.

I am sure I may safely leave it to the Senator from Massachusetts and the writer of the article to thrash out the truth on that subject:

> Where private effort and private capital had failed, where tens of thousands had succumbed to disease, the Army of the United States cut the Isthmus, united the oceans on schedule time, and fought and conquered disease simultaneously.
> If the Army can do such work, why not keep it doing that work?
> Why must those officers go back to mere drilling, parading, saluting, and idling?
> The machines that have been working at Panama, the engineers of the Army, tens of thousands of private soldiers from the Army should be put to work on bigger national tasks.
> Directed by Goethals they should solve all our problems of water transportation.
> First of all, they should unite the city of Chicago, the whole of the Great Lakes region, all of the lake cities, with the Gulf of Mexico and the East and the West by means of a great waterway running north and south.
> The route by water is already marked out. Nature has done a great part of the work.
> The Army of the United States should make it possible to ship automobiles from Detroit, manufactured steel from Gary, clothing from Chicago, and all the products of the region of the Middle West by water in unbroken packages down to the Gulf of Mexico, east through the canal, and west to all of Europe.
> The Army has made it possible for our east and west coasts to trade by water without going around the Horn.
> The Army now should make it possible for Chicago products, all the lake city products, and the products of all the cities along the Mississippi and the Missouri to go by water direct to all parts of our western and eastern coasts.
> Would not that be better than keeping officers and men idle?
> The country needs that great "Lincoln Highway," uniting the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans. The Army of the United States should build it.
> A great English scientist says that "It is a shame to keep the armies of Europe pipe-claying their belts when they might be used for scientific experiment."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona permit me to interrupt his reading of the editorial at that point?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think the Senator from Arizona has read far enough into this editorial to determine that the writer of it evidently thinks that the enlisted men of the Army ought to be put to work at building highways and the various other things that have been stated. Does the Senator from Arizona think, if it were made the rule, not only that the enlisted men should be compelled to serve after having enlisted for a period of three or four or five years, whatever their period of enlistment may be, but that they might be compelled to work on the roadways during that whole time, that we could get any men to enlist in the Army for $13 or $15 a month?

Mr. ASHURST. No, Mr. President.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Their pay would have to be increased.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator knows that it would have to be increased.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now, let me ask the Senator another question. These men, because it is an absolute necessity, are compelled to enlist for a definite period of time. If they desert during that time, they can be punished under the law. Does the Senator think it would be wise to ingraft upon our institutions the further requirement that these men should be held to involuntary servitude for a period of three or four or five years?

Mr. ASHURST. No. As a complement to that plan and as a part and parcel of that plan should go the repeal of that odious law—I think it is the Dick militia law—requiring men to enlist in times of peace. That odious form of involuntary servitude should be repealed at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. We have not any such law.

Mr. ASHURST. I am delighted to learn that fact.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Men are permitted to enlist or not, as they please, but they are not required to enlist. When a man has enlisted in the Army does the Senator think that man during the three years of his term ought to be compelled to work upon the roads whether or not he desires that sort of employment; and if he were compelled to work upon the roads, would not that be a species of involuntary servitude?

Mr. ASHURST. The system which compels him to remain in idleness is not only odious, but it is injurious to the soldier and injurious to the public welfare. This editorial proceeds:

The Army should not be used merely for pipe-claying belts nor for scientific experiments in diet.

Army and Navy should be used to increase the wealth of the Nation instead of impoverishing the Nation.

Human intelligence easily could arrange an Army and Navy program that would give employment to hundreds of thousands reclaiming our swamps, irrigating our deserts, carrying our ocean freights and our passengers on inland waterways, at the same time making the idea of attack by a foreign enemy preposterous.

We have at best a few battleships and a few cruisers, coalers, torpedo boats, etc.

Let the people of the United States combine a merchant marine and a protective navy in one.

Mr. President, while this article is interesting to me and to many others, I feel I would be imposing upon the patience and time of the Senate to read it further. I therefore ask to include the remainder of the article in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The remainder of the editorial is as follows:

The country, to begin, should build 500 powerful ships, that need not be the latest type of battleship nor laden down with armor or guns, but carrying the freight of the country.

Let them leave their big guns on shore in time of peace.

Thus our ancestors of the Revolution and the fighting Boers of the Transvaal left their rifles hanging over the mantelpiece while they worked in the fields. But their enemies knew that the rifles were there to be used. England found out to her cost that a man might use his rifle only occasionally and still be a formidable soldier. Our battleships could leave their guns "hanging over the mantel" on shore.

Suppose that the United States owned 500 great ships at sea, each carrying its thousands of tons of freight, at a price only sufficient to pay the cheap interest charge at which this Government can borrow money.

Suppose that the United States, on lakes, rivers, and other inland waters, had another fleet of a thousand swift boats, each with a torpedo tube in the bow, these boats carrying passengers, express, and mail in time of peace.

Uncle Sam could say to his friends across the ocean, "I don't want to fight and I don't bleed my people to death building dreadnaughts, but I have 500 heavy ships and for each one an equipment of great power guns that could be quickly taken aboard in place of freight.

"And I have a thousand swiftly moving boats each with its torpedo tube, capable of carrying a big load of torpedoes.

"My sailors are well paid and contented, because they are working usefully. My gunners, kept in constant practice, are the best in the world.

"Send your fleets to attack me. I will meet you with half a thousand heavy ships, well armed, and a thousand torpedo boats, and a thousand air machines carrying dynamite."

Is there any reason why the United States in place of a little expensive Navy, run at a dead loss and costing hundreds of millions a year, should not have a gigantic commercial navy, self-supporting, limited in size only by the size of the prosperity and freight demands of the United States?

With 500 great ships, 5,000 heavy guns that could quickly be put aboard, divided between our Pacific coast and our eastern coast, with the Panama Canal uniting them, and with a thousand swift torpedo boats to sail out with them, why should we need fear the small battle fleets that might come straggling across the thousands of miles of ocean to attack us?

If John D. Rockefeller owned the United States, don't you suppose that his organizing ability would multiply our Navy by a hundred, make it pay its own way, and make the sailors, instead of being constant deserters, satisfied men—as the drivers of the Standard Oil wagons are satisfied?

Why can not the people of the United States do for themselves with their own Navy what John D. Rockefeller would do if the Navy were his?

If Rockefeller owned the Army of the United States and the soil of the United States, would not that Army be made self-supporting, that soil more valuable?

The Roman soldier was used to conquer and kill peaceful, helpless, half-civilized peoples. In his old age they gave him a few acres of the land whose owners he had helped to murder.

The Army of the United States could conquer deserts and swamps by irrigating and draining. And the soldier in his old age, as a reward, would have his farm, given to him as part of the land reclaimed by him.

Even in the hardest times it is difficult to get men for our Army. Healthy men hate a lazy, idle life. But give your Army good pay, eight hours of work per day, three hours of drill per week—which would be plenty—and freedom like any other worker the rest of the time, and you will have an Army worth while.

The Army of the United States should be a citizen Army, with half a million useful men in place of the little handful of professional donothings.

Each of these men would have his fighting equipment in the national barracks, to be used only in the event of war—and that would never come.

No nation would attack this country if we had a fleet as big as our prosperity and a well-paid, patriotic, citizen Army as big as our need of internal improvements.

Armies and navies were maintained in the beginning to uphold tyranny and flatter the vanity of rulers. The soldier was saddled on the back of the peasant, who had to feed him. And bleeding the peasantry with taxes and the sword was royal pastime.

The same system has continued in Europe—a nonproductive army, idle, and fed by the poor workers.

We should have a better system in this country. Some man will come to power able to install such a system.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am heartily in favor of the amendment which has been proposed by the committee. The amount reported by the committee as an amendment to the House bill is very much lower than the estimate made by the War Department for the purchase of the necessary equipment for a war, if we should have one.

I am sorry to disagree with my friend the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], but I have always been one of those who believe that the best safeguard against war is to be thoroughly ready for it when it comes. There is no better preservative of peace than that. While the great exponent and apostle of peace, our friend Mr. Andrew Carnegie, talks peace all the time—and I believe he has complimented the German Empire upon the fact that it has been able to maintain peace for so many years—I regard that as proof positive that the best way for any country in the world to preserve peace is to be ready for war; and no country has ever been better prepared for war than has Germany.

A careful reading of the testimony given before the House committee and of the testimony taken before the Senate Committee on Appropriations discloses the fact that this powder and these munitions of war are absolutely necessary for properly equipping the Army of the United States. I do not think that it would be improper to say here now that the situation which confronts our country is somewhat delicate. It is a recognized fact that if the Army of the United States had been properly prepared when the Civil War began there would have been much saving of life in the first battle of Bull Run.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SAULSBURY in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the Senator from Oregon understand that the armament referred to here is sufficient for an army of half a million men?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; it is not.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I understand that it is.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the estimates of the War Department may be relied upon, it is not sufficient.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I understood the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] to say that the armament provided for here was on the basis of an army of 500,000 men.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, if the Senator drew that inference from what I said probably it was my fault; but I did not intend to convey that impression. I intended to say that it was the purpose of the War Department within three and a half years to arrive at that number of guns—1,292 guns—which would supply an army of half a million.

Now, if the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] will pardon me, since that question is up one would imagine from this debate that we were providing here for the manufacture of 300 or 400 siege cannon. As a matter of fact, this appropriation will only buy 32 cannon and 2 ammunition batteries for 3-inch guns, 1 ammunition battery for 4.7-inch guns; and the appropriation for the guns themselves, for 6 batteries of 3-inch mountain howitzers, 4 guns to a battery, which would be 24 guns, and 2 batteries for 4.7-inch howitzers, 4 guns to the battery, which would be 32 guns, and then for the carriages, as provided here, $900,000. There are now left, in order to supply the guns which are required for the Regular Army and the volunteers, 143. This appropriation provides for 32; so that there are over a hundred more to be provided for. It is the intention of the War Department within three and a half years to bring this supply of arms and artillery up to 1,292 guns, 143 to be provided for in the fortifications appropriation bill and the balance of 300 to be provided for in the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Florida for having gone into the details of the matter. We both were on the subcommittee which had this matter under consideration, and both thought that the War Department was really modest in its estimates for the necessary equipment of the Army.

I was going on to say, Mr. President, that it was a recognized fact that if the United States Army had been properly prepared and equipped at the time the Civil War began an immense number of human lives might have been saved in the first battles of the war. It was not only not equipped as to ammunition and guns, but it was not equipped properly in the training of the men.

It is recognized, too, I believe, that in the Spanish-American War our operations were halted from the fact that we were not properly prepared to adjust promptly our difficulties in Cuba. The Spanish Army was better equipped than was the Army of the United States. While we were there fighting with black powder the Spaniards had smokeless powder, and we made ourselves targets for the Spaniards with their modern guns and the most modern powder. So it is in this case.

Mr. President, if we are going to have any trouble at all—and nobody hopes more strongly than I do that we may never have trouble—we ought to prepare ourselves now, and not undertake to do so in the emergency of war. The committee having gone into this matter very carefully, I feel that the action of the committee in reporting this increase over the House appropriation ought to be sustained.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, so that there may be no misunderstanding, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] to a statement he made in relation to the cost of powder.

It is true, Mr. President, that when smokeless powder was first manufactured the Government had to pay a dollar a pound for it, as the Senator from Arizona has stated; but after the process of manufacturing smokeless powder by the private concerns manufacturing it in this country had become better known and the machinery for its manufacture had been improved the price of that kind of powder began to decline until it reached, I believe, 72 cents. It was at that time that the Government first considered the manufacture of smokeless powder for our Army and our Navy.

I did not want the Senator to be misled by anything that I said in relation to the reduction in the price of powder, because the reduction in the price of powder to 53 cents or 65 cents, as the case may be, was not altogether due, as might be inferred from what the Senator has said, to the Government starting the manufacture of smokeless powder for our Army and Navy. I wanted to make that statement so that the Senator from Arizona would know just what I meant if I did not make myself plain in the first place.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I fear the study of this bill by the Senator from Arizona has not taken him as far as page 9. I read a provision of the bill from that page, as follows:

Of each of the sums appropriated by this act, after deducting any amounts required to meet obligations authorized in previous acts to be entered into by contract, not more than 10 per cent may be used to purchase not exceeding 10 per cent in quantity or value of any article or material herein appropriated for that can be manufactured at the arsenals of the Ordnance Department, except when contract costs are less than arsenal manufacturing costs.

I read that, Mr. President, as a complete refutation of the implied charge that any of these amounts were raised over the House provision in order to give employment to private manufacturers. It is true that a large amount of money is spent for the Army and the Navy, and, perhaps, adding the amount spent for pensions, the percentage stated by the Senator is approximately correct. I am very glad to know that the Senator disapproves of the tremendous expenditures which this Government has made for the wars which have passed, because it is unquestioned that more money has been spent for pensions than should have been.

Mr. President, I have no doubt that in the event of war, even with a second-rate power, there would be called into the service of this Government half a million men. There are 292,000 members of the National Guard now who would not have to reenlist if this Government should go to war. It seems to me, Mr. President, that it would be little less than criminal to take these men into war without proper equipment for battle.

Of course, as I have stated, all these 1,292 guns would not be in action at the same time. This is too big a country, Mr. President, to undertake to carry them from one point to another. It is proposed to provide 1,292 guns for the entire Army; and we are quarreling here over an appropriation for 32 guns. That is the sum and substance of this complaint.

Men talk about economy in a great many ways. I think it would be poor economy not to provide the necessary equipment for this Government. I do not know what others have understood, but I have never understood that to be the policy of the Democratic Party. However that may be, certain it is that the Democratic Secretary of War of this administration appeared before both committees of the House and the Senate and urged with great earnestness that this estimate be allowed to stand. I ask for a vote.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I desire the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] to hear me say that he must know that in what I have said I have neither impliedly nor otherwise charged that the committee had done this or done anything for the purpose or with the idea of giving the manufacturers of arms or powder a profit. The Senator must know that I have never entertained any such idea, for the committee which reported the bill and of which he is a member is far above such a suspicion.

Mr. BRYAN. I understand that, Mr. President, but the Senator made the statement here in the Senate that this might inure to the benefit of private manufacturers, and I wanted him to understand that they can only get contracts for these guns if they make them more cheaply than the Government itself can make them.

Mr. ASHURST. I ought to say, in conclusion, that I have had the honor to serve on one appropriation committee with the Senator from Florida, and no Senator here is more careful in respect to paying out the public funds than is the Senator from Florida.

ARTICLES OF WAR.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, there is another military measure, which has come to the Senate from the Committee on Military Affairs, which I should like to have taken up and considered, if there is no objection. It is the bill making a recodification of the Articles of War.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1032) to amend section 1342 and chapter 6, Title XIV, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be read first for committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, in article 13, under the subhead "C. Jurisdiction," on page 6, line 23, after the word "shall," to strike out "have power to adjudge punishment not to exceed confinement at hard labor for six months or forfeiture of six months' pay, or both, and in addition thereto reduction to the ranks in the cases of noncommissioned officers, and reduction in classification in the cases of first-class privates," and insert "not have power to adjudge confinement in excess of six months, nor to adjudge the forfeiture of more than six months' pay," so as to make the clause read:

Miscellaneous provisions," on page 50, line 19, before the word "inclusive," to strike out "29, 54 to 98" and insert "30, 56 to 99"; and in line 21, before the word "inclusive," to strike out "106 to 111" and insert "107 to 112," so as to make the clause read:

ART. 113. Certain articles to be read and explained.—Articles 1, 2, 30, 56 to 99, inclusive, and 107 to 112, inclusive, shall be read and explained to every soldier at the time of his enlistment or muster in, or within six days thereafter, and shall be read and explained once in every six months to every garrison, regiment, or company in the service of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 56, after line 20, to strike out:

1. The United States military prison, Fort Leavenworth, Kans., shall hereafter be known as the United States military detention barracks; and the Pacific branch of the United States military prison, Alcatraz Island, Cal., shall hereafter be known as the United States military prison.

2. Offenders convicted by courts-martial or other military tribunals of purely military offenses alone or in connection with or involving common-law or statutory offenses not felonious in character may be confined and detained in the United States military detention barracks; and all other offenders convicted by courts-martial or other military tribunals may be confined in the United States military prison.

3. The government and control of the United States military detention barracks and of the United States military prison shall be vested in the Secretary of War, who shall from time to time make such regulations respecting the same as may be deemed necessary, and who shall submit annually to the Congress a full statement of the financial and other affairs of said institutions for the preceding fiscal year.

4. The officers of the United States military detention barracks shall consist of a commandant and such subordinate officers as may be necessary, who shall be detailed by the Secretary of War from the commissioned officers of the Army; and a sufficient number of enlisted men shall be detailed by the Secretary of War for duty as guards at said detention barracks and as assistants to the officers thereof. The United States military prison shall be similarly officered and provided with enlisted guards and assistants.

5. The commandant of the United States military detention barracks shall have command thereof and charge and custody of all offenders sent thereto for confinement therein; shall, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, govern such offenders, and cause them to be employed at such labor and in such trades and to perform such duties as may be deemed best for their health and reformation and with a view to their honorable restoration to duty, as hereinafter authorized; shall cause note to be taken and a record to be made of the conduct of such offenders; shall shorten the daily time of hard labor of those who by their obedience, honesty, industry, or general good conduct earn such favors; and may place under military training those offenders whose conduct during confinement or detention has been such as to warrant the belief that upon completion of a course of such military training they may be worthy of an honorable restoration to duty or of being permitted to reenlist; and the Secretary of War may remit the unexecuted portions of the sentences of such offenders, and may in addition to such remission give them an honorable restoration to duty or authorize their reenlistment in case the same is merited.

6. The commandant of the United States military prison shall have command thereof and charge and custody of all offenders sent thereto for confinement therein; shall, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, govern such offenders and cause them to be employed at such labor and in such trades as may be deemed best for their health and reformation; shall cause note to be taken and a record to be made of the conduct of such offenders; and shall shorten the daily time of labor of those who by their obedience, honesty, industry, or general good conduct earn such favors; and the Secretary of War may remit the unexecuted portions of the sentences of such offenders in case the same is merited.

7. The commandant of the United States military detention barracks shall have custody of all public property connected with said detention barracks; shall have power to sell and dispose of any articles manufactured by the offenders confined or detained under his charge or custody, and shall regularly account for the proceeds thereof; shall receive and disburse all money provided or used for the said detention barracks; shall give bond and security for the faithful keeping and accounting of all money and property coming into his hands as commandant; shall cause to be kept, in suitable books, complete accounts of all the property, income, expenses, business, and concerns of said detention barracks; and shall make full and regular reports concerning all of said matters to the Secretary of War. The commandant of the United States military prison shall have like powers and duties in respect of the corresponding affairs of said prison.

8. The Secretary of War may from time to time designate any building or structure or any part thereof under the control of the Secretary of War and pertaining to the military establishment as a branch military detention barracks for the confinement and detention of offenders whom it is impracticable to send to the United States military detention barracks at Fort Leavenworth, and may likewise designate any such building or structure or part thereof as a branch military prison for the confinement of offenders whom it is impracticable to send to the United States military prison at Alcatraz. Branch military detention barracks shall be subject to the laws respecting the United States military detention barracks at Fort Leavenworth, and branch military prisons shall be subject to the laws relating to the United States military prison at Alcatraz: Provided, That branch military detention barracks and branch military prisons shall have such officers as the Secretary of War may deem necessary—

And insert:

1. The United States military prison, Fort Leavenworth, Kans., shall hereafter be known as the United States military detention barracks.

2. Persons sentenced to confinement upon conviction by courts-martial or other military tribunals of crimes or offenses which, under some statute of the United States or under some law of the State, Territory, District, or other jurisdiction in which the crime or offense may be committed, are punishable by confinement in a penitentiary, including persons sentenced to confinement upon conviction by courts-martial or other military tribunals of two or more acts or omissions, any one of which, under the statute or other law hereinbefore mentioned, constitutes or includes a crime or offense punishable by confinement in a penitentiary, may be confined at hard labor, during the entire period of confinement so adjudged, in any United States, State, Territorial, or District penitentiary, or in any other penitentiary directly or indirectly under the jurisdiction of the United States; and all persons sentenced to confinement, upon conviction by courts-martial or other military tribunals, who are not confined in a penitentiary may be confined and detained in the United States military detention barracks.

3. The government and control of the United States military detention barracks and of all offenders sent thereto for confinement and detention therein shall be vested in the Secretary of War, who shall from time to time make such regulations respecting the same as may be deemed necessary, and who shall submit annually to Congress a full statement of the financial and other affairs of said institution for the preceding fiscal year.

4. The officers of the United States military detention barracks shall consist of a commandant and such subordinate officers as may be necessary, who shall be detailed by the Secretary of War from the commissioned officers of the Army at large. In addition to detailing for duty at said detention barracks such number of enlisted men of the staff corps and other departments as he may deem necessary, the Secretary of War shall assign a sufficient number of enlisted men of the line of the Army for duty as guards at said detention barracks and as noncommissioned officers of the disciplinary organizations hereinafter authorized. Said guards, and also the enlisted men assigned for duty as noncommissioned officers of disciplinary organizations, shall be detached from the line of the Army or enlisted for the purpose; and said guards shall be organized as infantry, with noncommissioned officers, musicians, artificers, and cooks of the number and grades allowed by law for Infantry organizations of like strength: Provided, That at least one of said guards shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a battalion sergeant major.

5. The commandant of the United States military detention barracks shall have command thereof and charge and custody of all offenders sent thereto for confinement and detention therein; shall govern such offenders and cause them to be employed at such labor and in such trades and to perform such duties as may be deemed best for their health and reformation and with a view to their honorable restoration to duty or their reenlistment as hereinafter authorized; shall cause note to be taken and a record to be made of the conduct of such offenders; and may shorten the daily time of hard labor of those who by their obedience, honesty, industry, and general good conduct earn such favors—all under such regulations as the Secretary of War may from time to time prescribe.

6. The Secretary of War shall provide for placing under military training those offenders sent to the United States military detention barracks for confinement and detention therein whose record and conduct are such as to warrant the belief that upon the completion of a course of military training they may be worthy of an honorable restoration to duty or of being permitted to reenlist; may provide for the organization of offenders so placed under military training into disciplinary companies and higher units, organized as infantry, with noncommissioned officers, except color sergeants, selected or appointed from the enlisted men assigned to duty for that purpose pursuant to the provisions of paragraph 4 hereof; and may provide for uniforming, arming, and equipping such organizations.

7. Whenever he shall deem such action merited the Secretary of War may remit the unexecuted portions of the sentences of offenders sent to the United States military detention barracks for confinement and detention therein, and in addition to such remission may grant those who have not been discharged from the Army an honorable restoration to duty, and may authorize the reenlistment of those who have been discharged or upon their written application to that end order their restoration to the Army to complete their respective terms of enlistment, and such application and order of restoration shall be effective to revive the enlistment contract for a period equal to the one not served under said contract.

8. The Secretary of War may, from time to time, designate any building or structure or any part thereof under the control of the Secretary of War and pertaining to the military establishment as a branch military detention barracks for the confinement and detention of offenders whom it is impracticable to send to the United States military detention barracks at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.; and all branch military detention barracks and all offenders sent thereto for confinement and detention therein shall be subject to the laws respecting the United States military detention barracks at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., and the offenders sent thereto for confinement and detention therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, page 67, line 11, before the word "three," to strike out "section" and insert "sections 2 and," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. That except as to sections 2 and 3, which shall take effect at once, this act shall take effect six months after the date of approval thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This completes the reading of the bill.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, on page 28, line 1, the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] moved that the words "governors, legislatures" be stricken out, and it was agreed to. That matter was discussed, I remember, at some length in the committee, and my understanding was that it was agreed that on line 4 the words "or the chief magistrate or legislature of any State, Territory" should also be stricken out.

It seems to me we should either write the words "governors, legislatures" in the caption of the article or else we should strike out the words "or the chief magistrate or legislature of any State, Territory."

The Senator from Oregon, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, is, of course, fully advised as to just what was the intent of the committee, and I should like to have him explain to us at this time what he understood was the action of the committee.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I think it was the intention of the subcommittee to strike out of the bill, in line 4, beginning with the word "or," to and inclusive of the word "quartered," in line 6, so as not to make it a contempt for an officer to use disrespectful words of a governor, legislature, or officers of possessions of the United States, but to confine it to the men who are directly in charge of the Army. So I ask to have those words stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 28, lines 4, 5, and 6, strike out the words "or the chief magistrate or legislature of any State, Territory, or other possession of the United States in which he is quartered."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In view of that amendment I desire to have inserted after the words United States, in line 3, the word "or," so that it will read "the Congress of the United States or the Secretary of War."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 28, line 3, after the words United States, strike out the comma and insert the word "or," so as to read:

Any officer who uses contemptuous or disrespectful words against the President, Vice President, the Congress of the United States or the Secretary of War shall be dismissed from the service or suffer such other punishment as a court-martial may direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHILTON. I move to amend article 34, on page 15, which reads, "a court-martial may punish, at discretion, any person who uses any menacing words," etc., by inserting, after the word discretion, in line 21, "subject to the limitations contained in article 14." I do not believe that a commission should have unlimited authority as to anything and that the limitations as to punishment prescribed by them should apply to contempts of court-martial as well as any other kind of offense. I ask the Secretary to state the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, line 21, after the word "discretion," insert "subject to the limitations contained in article 14," so as to read:

A court-martial may punish, at discretion, subject to the limitations contained in article 14, any person who uses any menacing words, signs, or gestures in its presence, or who disturbs its proceedings by any riot or disorder.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say that the provision sought to be amended is the article of 1806. So it has been on the statute books for more than 100 years; in fact, I do not know but that it is a part of the Articles of War of 1776. I have no objection to the amendment of the Senator. I think it ought to be included. I think the statute ought to be amended as suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN WYOMING.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 166, being Senate bill 65. It is a very short local bill, and will, I think, provoke no debate.

Mr. CHILTON. What is the bill about?

Mr. WARREN. It relates to a quarter section of land in Wyoming.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the bill by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 65) to amend an act entitled "An act providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof," approved April 12, 1910.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming kindly tell us why the bill should be passed and why the State desires to be permitted to relinquish certain lands and select others?

Mr. WARREN. To correct errors in some entries which have been made. The bill has the indorsement of the Interior Department, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. What is the land that is proposed to be surrendered?

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps I might turn to the report here and inform the Senator. I read from the reply of Acting Secretary A. A. Jones to the letter of reference transmitted to him by the chairman of the committee:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, July 31, 1913.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands,
United States Senate.

SIR: In response to your request therefor, I have the honor to submit the following report on S. 2068, a bill to allow second entries under the homestead and desert-land laws in cases where applicants had heretofore made entries under these laws but lost, forfeited, or abandoned them.

The conditions upon which the second entries are to be allowed are those suggested in my report on S. 586, submitted May 3, 1913, to your committee, except that the present bill, in terms, provides for relief only in case one previous entry has been lost, while in my report I suggested a provision for previous entry or entries.

It would seem proper to provide for cases where an applicant had been so unfortunate as to fail in two or more previous efforts to obtain a home on the public lands and though the phraseology of the present bill might be construed to cover such a condition, it would appear advisable to amend the bill before passage by inserting the words "or entries" after "entry" in lines 5, 9, and 13.

As indicated in my report above mentioned, I heartily approve of the proposed legislation.

Respectfully, A. A. JONES, Acting Secretary.

It is simply to remedy a conflict of entries. The bill seeks to make the matter clear.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 108, being the bill (S. 2860) providing a temporary method of conducting the nomination and election of United States Senators. I will say that after the bill is taken up it is my purpose to ask that it be temporarily laid aside, because the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] desires to be heard on the bill, and he is absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2860) providing a temporary method of conducting the nomination and election of United States Senators.

Mr. WALSH. I ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). If there be no objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WALSH. On Friday last it was agreed that at the conclusion of morning business to-day the Senate should go into executive session. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 3 hours and 40 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 6 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 10, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate February 9, 1914.

Francis H. Weston, of Columbia, S. C., to be United States attorney, district of South Carolina, vice Ernest F. Cochran, resigned.

COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

James J. Brady, of Detroit, Mich., to be collector of internal revenue for the first district of Michigan, in place of Malcolm J. McLeod, superseded.

JUDGE OF UNITED STATES COURT FOR CHINA.

Charles Sumner Lobingier to be judge of the United States Court for China.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 9, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great Father Soul from whom we draw the breath of life and every thought that leads on to higher resolves and greater achievements, so move upon our hearts that we may see visions and be inspired to scale the heights which rise in splendor before us. We have not heard the last word; we have not caught the last vision. Thou art infinite, and Thy work is not done. There is still room for larger life and nobler attainments. May we be workers with Thee, through Thee, for Thee, that Thy purposes may be fulfilled in us. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, February 7, 1914, and of Sunday, February 8, 1914, was read and approved.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, EASTERN DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the conference report on the bill (H. R. 32) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 240).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 32) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 2.

On the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

H. D. CLAYTON,
C. C. CARLIN,
DICK T. MORGAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

LEE S. OVERMAN,
C. D. CLARK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT OF HOUSE CONFEREES.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 32) to provide for an additional judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, submits the following detailed statement in explanation of the effect of the question agreed upon and recommended in the conference report, namely:

Senate amendment No. 1, referred to in the report, is to strike out the proviso in section 1 of the bill, which reads as follows:

"Provided, however, That the President shall make public all indorsements made in behalf of the person appointed as such district judge."

The House conferees insisted that the Senate recede from this amendment, and the conferees were unable to agree.

Senate amendment No. 2 is section 3 of the bill, which was added by the Senate, and is as follows:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint an additional circuit judge for the fourth circuit, who shall receive the same salary as other circuit judges now receive, and shall reside within the said fourth circuit: Provided, That the office of circuit judge to which Robert W. Archbald was originally appointed is hereby abolished and no successor shall be appointed to fill said office."

The conferees agreed that the Senate recede from this amendment.

H. D. CLAYTON,
C. C. CARLIN,
DICK T. MORGAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, this matter has been before the House several times heretofore. I take it that it is well understood by the Members. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House recede from its opposition to Senate amendment numbered 1 and agree to Senate amendment numbered 1.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Has the conference report been disposed of?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. CLAYTON. I thought it had.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion is premature.

Mr. CLAYTON. I withhold it, then.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. It seems to me that is a mistake. The conference is not final.

The SPEAKER. The conference report, so far as it goes, is final.

Mr. PALMER. But the conference report is simply a report as to a disagreement on this amendment.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. PALMER. So far as this amendment is concerned——

Mr. MANN. There is a conference report on the other amendment—Senate amendment numbered 2.

Mr. PALMER. The conference report is that the conferees have disagreed as to amendment numbered 1. The adoption of the conference report would bring us nowhere so far as legislation is concerned.

The SPEAKER. So far as we have agreed, the thing to do is to put the vote, and after the partial conference report is agreed to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] will be in order.

Mr. PALMER. And the gentleman from Alabama will be recognized for that purpose?

The SPEAKER. Of course he will. The question is on agreeing to this conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Now, the motion is in order, if the gentleman from Alabama wishes to make it over again.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede from its disagreement in regard to Senate amendment numbered 1 and agree to said amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment numbered 1 and agree to the same.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CULLOP. The House having instructed the conferees heretofore by a vote, is not that motion now out of order until the instructions heretofore given the conferees are abrogated by a motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think so. The Chair thinks the conferees carried out the will of the House and are through with it. Now, the motion of the gentleman from Alabama practically is to change the instructions. That is the effect of it.

Mr. CULLOP. Well, a preferential motion, I suppose, would be one to instruct the House to stand by the first amendment?

Mr. CLAYTON. No; that is not preferential.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. As to the instructions to the conferees appointed under that conference, have the instructions not now fallen since the report has been made to the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that the conference committee had performed its function and carried out the instructions of the House, and is practically discharged, and the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama is undoubtedly preferential. The way to get at what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] is trying to get at is to beat the motion of the gentleman from Alabama. Then what would happen the Chair does not know. Several things might happen, however.

Mr. CULLOP. I can tell what I hope will happen.

The SPEAKER. Is there any agreement between the gentlemen as to debate?

Mr. CLAYTON. I have had a tentative agreement, Mr. Speaker, with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER], the author of the bill, and with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP], who is opposed to the Senate amendment striking out the Cullop provision from the bill.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma rose.

Mr. CLAYTON. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] and the same amount of time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, this is too important a matter to proceed with in the absence of a quorum, and I therefore make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama yields 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] and 20 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP]; and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-five gentleman are present; not a quorum.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will a call of the House now bring a vote on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON]?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I move a call of the House, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves a call of the House. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and ninety-seven Members, a quorum, have responded to their names.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Further proceedings under the call are dispensed with. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, so far as the merits of this bill are concerned, I take it that nothing need now be said. The previous action of the House and Senate has determined the fact that this legislation is necessary for the proper administration of public justice, in order that relief may be afforded to the courts in Pennsylvania. Therefore I shall not detain the House by a statement of facts showing the necessity for this bill, which creates an additional judge at Philadelphia. The previous action of the House and Senate demonstrates the fact that this additional judge ought to be provided immediately. The House thoroughly understands, from what has heretofore occurred on this floor, that the bill does not create a new judgeship, but merely provides that an additional judge may be appointed now to discharge the duties of the judge who is incapacitated by reason of ill health from discharging the functions of his office. Upon the death of the present incumbent no other judge will be appointed his successor. The additional judge provided in this bill will be his successor.

This bill passed the House with a proviso known as the Cullop-Mann amendment:

Provided, however, That the President shall make public all indorsements made in behalf of the person appointed as such district judge.

The bill went to the Senate with that proviso in it. The Senate struck out that proviso, and also further amended the bill by adding section 3, providing for an additional circuit judge for the fourth circuit.

The conferees on the part of the House were instructed to disagree to the Senate amendments and to insist upon the Senate receding from both those amendments. The House conferees obeyed the instructions of the House, and the Senate conferees receded from Senate amendment No. 2, providing for the additional circuit judge, but insisting upon the Senate amendment striking out the proviso I have just read. The House conferees insisted that this proviso be retained in the bill. The conferees were unable to agree upon this one proposition. Hence the matter has been brought back here, as shown by the conference report.

In order to test the sense of the House and in order that this necessary legislation may pass, I have made the motion that the House do not further insist upon the proviso which I have read. The Senate has agreed to the conference report by which the Senate conferees have insisted upon striking out the proviso contained in the Cullop amendment. It is therefore before the House. The House conferees bring it back here with the statement that we have endeavored to carry out the instructions of the House, but have been unable to induce the Senate to recede from its position in regard to Senate amendment No. 1. It is for the House to determine whether it will recede from its former position and agree to the Senate amendment and thereby secure the passage of this bill. I can say frankly to the House that the action of the Senate leads the House conferees to believe that this bill can not pass with this proviso in it. If this bill passes, it can not be doubted that President Wilson will make a proper appointment. He has appointed a number of judges and they have been confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will my colleague from Alabama yield five minutes to me?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement in reference to this bill and my position upon it. When the bill originally came before the House I voted for the Cullop amendment. The bill has been in conference twice since that time. The House has thoroughly and fully expressed its views and its approval of the Cullop amendment. There can be no doubt about the position of those who stood for that amendment at the time that it was originally voted on; but one House of Congress can not legislate without the concurrence of the other; it takes the action of both Houses in order to perfect legislation. Now, the Cullop amendment can be passed as an independent matter and sent to the Senate for its action. It is evident that the Senate would not at this time approve it. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that because we are in favor of a particular proposition it is necessary for us to postpone indefinitely and defeat needed remedial legislation. We are facing one of two problems. We have either got to kill this bill, of which we approve, containing remedial legislation that is necessary in order that the judicial business of the State of Pennsylvania may be carried on properly and in order that innocent people may not suffer, or else we have got to accept this conference report and recede from the Cullop amendment. This is simply a practical proposition——

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. How vital does the gentleman think this judgeship is? I have not heard all the debate about it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not studied it myself, but I think it is vital, or the Judiciary Committee would not have reported this bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Does it contain any other thing than the creation of another Federal judgeship there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think it does.

Mr. CLAYTON. I will answer that question by saying that it does not do anything except provide for an additional judge over in Philadelphia. It provides further that whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of the district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, senior in commission, such vacancy shall not be filled. It does not provide an additional permanent judgeship, but simply provides for an exigency which exists on account of the hopeless inability of one of the judges there to discharge the duties of his office.

I may say that this action is not without precedent. A similar thing was done in the case of a judge in Ohio. A similar thing was done in the case of a judge in Texas, and in the case of a judge in Maryland, where their health was permanently impaired, and they could not discharge the duties of their office, and public justice was being denied. Further, there are the precedents in the cases of Justice Hunt and Justice Moody, of the Supreme Court of the United States. Congress has passed bills similar to this heretofore. It is nothing strange in the legislative history of our country.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am assuming, as my colleague from Alabama has stated, that this is a meritorious bill. I have not had a chance to investigate the details myself, but the bill has come here with the unanimous report of the Judiciary Committee of the House. It has the unanimous report of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and it has been before the House more than six months, with ample opportunity to everybody to look into its merits. Under these circumstances I am convinced that it is a meritorious bill. Now, the only problem is as to whether, because we stood for an amendment to this bill that will not be accepted by the Senate after earnest efforts on our part to have it accepted by them, we ought to stand here and defeat this legislation, simply because the Senate will not agree to an amendment that we thought meritorious.

I think the time for us to do that is past. I think we have made as earnest an effort as could be made to pass the Cullop amendment. I shall therefore vote to concur in the Senate amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used 12 minutes, including that used by Mr. UNDERWOOD.

Mr. PALMER was recognized.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CULLOP. I understood the chairman of the committee to yield me 20 minutes and to the gentleman from Pennsylvania 20 minutes, and that we should be entitled to control the time.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman is correct in part. I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana 20 minutes, and, of course, that 20 minutes will be entirely subject to his control.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, this bill passed the House early last summer, immediately after the passage of the tariff bill. At that time it was a matter of the most urgent necessity. Conditions in the eastern district of Pennsylvania to-day are such that it is no exaggeration to say that if this bill shall now fail of passage it will amount to an absolute denial of justice to our people. The situation is that we have a judge in the eastern district of Pennsylvania who is hopelessly ill. He can not recover; he is physically incapacitated from the performance of any service as a judge. He has been for some years on the bench and for many years in the public service. He has accumulated no property, and it is not fair to expect that he should resign in order to relieve the congested condition of business due to his incapacity. Therefore this bill provides for a new judge only temporarily. When the vacancy occurs the senior in commission, that vacancy will not be filled. So that all you are doing, in effect, is to permit us to have two judges, as we always have had, and not to make us suffer by reason of the unfortunate circumstances that Judge Holland is too sick to do any work.

Now, this bill, as has been stated, would have been a law a long time ago if it had not been encumbered by the CULLOP amendment, which has engendered a fight both in the Senate and in the House. I am here to ask you gentlemen of the House to forget your views on the CULLOP amendment proposition for the present, and remember that you have gone on record on one side or the other of it twice and have made your record, and be willing to let us have this judge in Pennsylvania in order that justice may be done to our people.

I want to show you the condition of affairs in that district now, a condition which is growing steadily worse every day. I have here a statement made by the clerk of courts at the time Judge Thompson, who is now performing service, assumed office, on July 20, 1912. There were pending in that district in law and equity 1,538 cases. Since that date there have been instituted 1,029 cases. Disposition has been made of 400 cases, and there are still pending 2,100 cases.

Judge Thompson has actually presided in open court 285 days. Of jury trials there have been 162; naturalization hearings, 52; petitions for naturalization granted, 1,962; arguments on all classes of motions, 1,475; equity and admiralty trials in open court, 24; opinions written, 74; and orders and decrees, 2,300. All that in a year and a half by one judge, who has been working days and nights and Sundays without a vacation to keep down the work of that court and do his business and relieve the people of the consequences of the illness of his colleague. The record of work done there is unsurpassed in the district or in the country.

Let me show you what is still on the docket, undisposed-of business: Opinions to be written in cases already tried in petition and admiralty cases, 25; cases for jury trial at the April term, 75; cases composed largely of patent and admiralty matters ordered on the argument list and awaiting dates for hearing, 51; petitions for naturalization awaiting a hearing in open court, 2,521; applications for leave to file petitions for naturalization, 4,860; indictments to be presented at the March term, 35; cases pending against the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. and the Keystone Elevator Co., involving violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act, which it is said will take two or three weeks to try. There are other cases listed on the trial list which will take three or four weeks to try.

Now, the result of all this is that if you do not pass the bill and give this district an additional judge, these cases will be deferred so long, and the trials will be so long continued and postponed, that I am strictly within the fact when I say that your refusal will amount to a denial to the people of the eastern district of Pennsylvania of justice to which they are entitled in their court. As I said, we would have had this judge—for I am satisfied the House agrees with the necessity of it—we would have had this judge if it had not been complicated by an amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and known in the House as the Cullop amendment, requiring publicity to be given by the President to the indorsements of the successful applicant for judge.

I do not intend now to discuss the merits of that amendment. I do believe that this bill is no place to discuss or dispose of that great proposition upon its merits. There is only one reason why it got enough votes on this special bill on this side of the House to make it a serious matter, and that was that the Baltimore platform contained a commendation of publicity and indorsements for presidential appointees. When this matter was up the Baltimore platform was quoted to the majority Members of the House, and many felt that they must follow it, even at the expense of the Philadelphia judgeship.

I want to say this: That, admitting the full force of a platform declaration of that kind, I can not believe that it binds Members of this House to vote for the proposition whenever and wherever it may appear, regardless of results upon other important legislation. The Baltimore platform declared for an income tax; yet if the Committee on Appropriations had brought in an appropriation bill and fastened to it an income tax there would have been no violation of the platform pledges if the Democratic Members of this House voted to strike out of an appropriation bill a provision for an income tax. You may cite any number of cases of that character. You may be stanchly and strongly in favor of the principle of publicity of indorsements of Federal judges, and yet we will not be violating that principle by saying that you shall not apply it to a single judgeship in Pennsylvania, while no publicity will be given to every other appointment of judges in the country. You have no reason to believe that the present President of the United States is going to make any improper appointment of a judge in this particular district. You have no reason to require that publication be made of the indorsements of this particular judge and of no other. Yet that is what you are doing if you insist upon this amendment and it should become a law. You are saying that all other judges everywhere throughout the country who may be appointed shall be appointed without regard to publicity of indorsements, but that in this single case you require that it shall be done. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Indiana will use some of his time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana, Judge CULLOP, is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I will inquire of the other side whether there will be more than one speech?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; my colleague on the committee [Mr. DUPRÉ] wants a minute, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LOGUE] wants a few moments, and also the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, this question has been before the House three times. It was voted upon in the Sixty-second Congress, indorsed on three roll calls by an overwhelming majority. It was indorsed by this House on a roll call by an overwhelming majority, and then the conferees were instructed to stand by this amendment by an overwhelming majority. I think that the House now ought to stand by it. [Applause.] The measure is meritorious. I stood for it when there was a Republican President and I stand for it now when there is a Democratic President. [Applause.]

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman if he will be willing to forego this amendment on this bill if the Committee on the Judiciary would report an independent bill for this subject?

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I will frankly answer the gentleman on that subject. I would not. If we stand for anything, if it is good enough to be adopted as a general law, it is good enough to be adopted upon all other occasions, wherever its application can be made, and that is the situation here.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] a moment ago said that we would be selecting this particular bill if we voted for this amendment at this time. I will ask the gentleman if we did not select particular bills during the Republican Congress and vote on particular bills?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. And if the gentleman from Pennsylvania did not vote for it at that time?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly. Here is the situation in Philadelphia: I am opposed to the gentleman's bill. If he had a bill to retire the present judge, to retire him on a salary, I would vote for it because of the situation there; but this thing of creating two judgeships where the law only requires one is absolutely wrong, and it is setting a bad precedent in this House. Two or three precedents have already been cited. They were bad precedents. There is no justification for this action here now. The people there may be unfortunate in respect to their courts. People have been unfortunate in respect to courts as long as we have had courts. They are not entitled to any more relief now than other people who have suffered from the same inconveniences at different times throughout the history of the country.

What is the situation? They have a district judge there. He is sick and unable to discharge his duties. What do they propose? They propose to pass a law creating a new judgeship, or the appointment of a new judge, so that the people of that district will have two judges instead of one—one who is able to work and one who is not—and the people of the country have to pay the bill of both. The situation there can be relieved. The law provides relief for all such conditions. The court could designate a man from any part of the Union to go there and hold that court.

As a rule the Federal judges are not kept very busy in this country. In a great many of the districts they are not employed all of the time, and the court has a right under the present law to appoint some judge to go there and hold that court, try and dispose of those cases. They are not doing that. They could have done that if they would apply to the right channel, and this bill, it seems to me, smacks very strongly of giving some man in this country a new job; some man who wants a judgeship. [Applause.] This matter could be relieved very easily. There will be no trouble about it. The law provides how it can be done, and the court can designate another judge from some other circuit in this country to go there and hold that court and try and dispose of those cases, and yet they are not having that done. Why?

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. PALMER. I would like to say to the gentleman that has been done, and even that has not been sufficient to keep this work down.

Mr. CULLOP. Well——

Mr. PALMER. Just one moment, if the gentleman will permit me. I shall not take up very much time. Judge Singer, of Ohio, Judge McPherson, and Judge Whitmer, and other judges have sat in the court during the past six months, and——

Mr. CULLOP. I want to answer that proposition.

Mr. PALMER. And application has been made for the assignment of one of these judges from the Commerce Court bench, but it has been found that all four of these judges have already been assigned to districts in which they reside.

Mr. CULLOP. Let me answer the gentleman.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Just one moment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CULLOP. No; I can not yield.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I want the gentleman to explain the Democratic platform adopted in Baltimore in 1912.

Mr. CULLOP. I do not want that done in my time. It indorses this amendment, and the Democrats of this House should stand by it.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I want to put it in in your time.

Mr. CULLOP. I will yield you enough time to put it in the RECORD, so as to show our party indorses this proposition.

If those judges are not going there and holding that court when designated by the proper authority, they ought to be removed, because the law makes it their duty to do so. The situation can be relieved right now under the law without making this imposition upon the people of this country in requiring them to pay for an extra judge. There is no trouble about relieving that situation, and the gentlemen of the House may just as well understand that now and let the country understand what the proposition is as to putting this new judge upon the bench. [Applause.] That matter can be very easily relieved, and if they apply to the proper authority for the appointment of a judge to go and hold that court and relieve that docket, if anyone refuses to go they can bring the proper action and have some man named in his place who will go.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] will be voted down. The Senate has just as much right to make a concession as the House, and it has no greater rights in the premises. This House has gone on record on this question, and it ought to stand by the record.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has used 9 minutes and has 11 minutes left. He now yields 3 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, the Cullop amendment is Democratic medicine, put up in a Democratic capsule, and I think it is good enough for the Democratic Party to take. And I commend to the Democratic Party the position of the President of the United States on the subject of abiding by campaign pledges. According to a little newspaper clipping which I have here, a lady, Mrs. Evans, appeared with 300 followers before the President the other day attempting to get his support for equal suffrage, and Mrs. Evans said to him that during the campaign they had worked their "finger nails off" in trying to get votes for him because they thought from his expressions that he was favorable to them. The President, according to the newspaper, replied:

"I was much freer to express opinion then than I am now."

"There are 300 working women outside awaiting your answer," said Mrs. Evans.

"I want to say just this," returned the President, "I need not tell you that what you have said makes a profound impression upon me, but I have already explained my limitations. Until a party as such has taken a position on a question, I am not at liberty to speak for it. I am limited in expressing my opinion, no matter what my individual thoughts may be. I have no doubt that your visit will make a profound impression."

Now, then, I say if the President is so limited by platform utterances the Democratic Party ought to be limited by platform utterances. But to turn to the real substance of this case, the matter of creating the special judgeship up there in the State of Pennsylvania, I am opposed to it on the merits of the proposition. I do not believe that we are going to correct these evils which the Democratic Party has always talked about, life tenure and other evils that are associated with the judiciary, by palliatives and by attempting to substitute one judge for another. I think in the district up there where the judge is needed the law ought to provide for efficiency. This act is practically a request to make way for life tenure, for a $7,000 a year pension, for inefficiency on the bench. I do not believe that kind of enactment ought to go in Congress. If the judge up there is not doing his duty, and there is no law on the books for the $7,000 pension, the Judiciary Committee of this House ought not to stand for adopting a $7,000 pension for a judge, or for anybody else, unless he is entitled to it, or unless you take up the proposition directly and pass a law regularly granting the pension.

As to this particular judge, I think he ought to be so enamored of his duty and so devoted to the principles of this Government and to the judiciary that he would not stand for accepting $7,000 a year for nothing for life without law or right. He has been on the bench seven years. That is a tremendous pension to give to a man who has been only seven years in the public service. They say he is without funds on which to live; but that is not the proposition before this Congress. If that district needs a judge, according to the statement the gentleman has just made, then at the death of Judge Holland they will want to continue the judicial position created by this act, and a successor to Judge Holland will then have to be named.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the feeling of some of our Democratic friends on this publicity proposition, but if they thoroughly understood the merits of this case I think they would pass this bill without question. We do not ask, in this instance, for the appointment of a Republican judge. We do not expect it. We need a judge to dispose of the congestion in that court. It is a great court, and its business has been centralized upon one judge because of the utter incapacity of his colleague. Three other judges have come into the district to aid the sitting judge. They have not been able to keep up with the current business at all, and their assistance has been temporary only. The court is two or three years behind in the matter of naturalizations alone. It will take that length of time to catch up. It is not unfair to ask that this bill be passed and that a new judge be appointed. It is only a question of time before the senior judge will pass away, much as we regret that fact. He has been a faithful judge, and to turn him out now when he is practically on his deathbed, as suggested by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN], would be a hardship and a cruelty.

It is not fair; it is not demanded by the people of this Nation that a faithful judge should be so treated.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that I may be permitted to extend my remarks by inserting from the Evening Bulletin, of Philadelphia, an article which covers this entire situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an editorial article from the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the article referred to:

OUR UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT.

The bill pending in Congress for an additional judge of the Federal Court of the Eastern District of Pennsylvania is in line with the desire of most of the lawyers and litigants who have cases pending before that court. Many complaints have been received at the court due to the increasing congestion of the docket, which includes cases in which millions of dollars are involved in disputed patent and property rights, and in view of the illness of the older judge, it is impossible for Judge Thompson to reduce the number of cases on the lists.

It seems unfair to the Federal judges, before whom are heard many cases involving questions of serious moment, although they receive no greater salary than the city pays the judiciary of the municipal court, to ask one, or even two men, to try the cases growing out of a jurisdiction embracing 10 counties and including such cities as Philadelphia, Reading, Norristown, Chester, Lancaster, and Easton.

Twenty-one hundred cases are now pending before the district court, which if disposed of at the rate of progress in the past year would require several years' steady work, not estimating the new cases which would be added at the rate of from seven to eight hundred a year. At the present time over 2,500 petitions for naturalization are awaiting hearing, and there are pending nearly 4,900 applications for leave to file petitions. For the coming term there are listed alone 51 patent and admiralty cases, 30 criminal suits, and 75 law and equity cases. The amount of work this means is enormous. Among the civil suits is the case of the Weisbach Lighting Co. against the city, which will take, perhaps, two weeks to try, and on the criminal list there is one charging a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act that it is thought will take three weeks to try. Further, it is estimated that six weeks will be needed to clean up the patent and admiralty cases, eight weeks to dispose of the naturalization hearings, and three weeks to hear the balance of the criminal cases. Five months in all, without counting time for writing opinions or keeping the bankruptcy lists active that are now heard on three days of the week.

To write an opinion in an important Federal suit requires that the judge be secluded for from two to four days, and the amount of the bankruptcy cases is indicated by the statement that in the past 18 months 580 petitions have been filed and 1,240 arguments heard. The court aims to keep the latter class of cases active, involving as they do the distribution of funds to creditors, and also strives to grant the privilege of citizenship as speedily as possible to those who desire it. But although nearly 2,000 naturalization petitions have been granted since the summer of 1912, 6,000 now await the court's attention.

Although the framers of the Judicial Code believed they provided relief by permitting the transfer of judges from other districts or from the circuit court of appeals, in instances of docket congestion, the plan has failed in practice, due to the unforeseen increase in the amount of business. Under the new rules the district court is compelled to hear the admiralty and patent arguments that were formerly made before masters, as well as dispose of the number of Federal cases growing out of the multiplication of statutes affecting business. In the last year and a half it has been possible to assign but three judges as assistants, two of whom, Judge Sater, of Ohio, and Judge McPherson, formerly of the district court and now of the circuit court of appeals, were able to dispose of but a relatively small number of cases, while the third, Judge Witmer, presided at the seven weeks' trial of the International Lumber Co.'s case.

Thus the general growth of litigation in the Federal Courts nullifies the benefits to be derived from the shifting of the judges contemplated in the code. All are busy, although all do not have the same number of people within their Territorial jurisdiction. In the passage of the various acts during the 125 years of the court's existence, it has been necessary to observe State lines, so that there is considerable variance, such as in the jurisdiction of the Delaware court, with a population of but little more than a half-dozen of this city's wards, and the jurisdiction of the court at Ninth and Chestnut Streets. But the big centers of population, where the larger interests and corporations are located, are also the centers of litigation. Compared with the eastern district of Pennsylvania, the southern district of New York, with but 700,000 more people, is served by four judges, and the northern district of Illinois, in which Chicago is situated, has recently received the benefit of one of the judges from the abolished Commerce Court, giving that district three judges for less than three and a half million people.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me two minutes?

Mr. CLAYTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], to agree to the Senate amendment and recede from the disagreement.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] a moment ago called attention to a statement, reputed to have been made by the President, in which he stated that he did not feel at liberty to take a position upon the suffrage question, because it was not referred to in the Democratic platform. I think the point made by the gentleman from Washington was not quite a sound one. The President has stated that he does not feel at liberty to take a position where the Democratic platform has not taken a position, but he has not stated that he did feel at liberty to repudiate the Democratic platform where it has taken a position. [Laughter.] It seems to me that the Democratic Members of the House are at as full liberty on this occasion to repudiate the Democratic platform upon this subject as the President is upon the Panama Canal tolls question. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, how much time is there remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has 14 minutes, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] has 8 minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Indiana occupy some of his time?

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to have the gentleman from Alabama occupy some of his time. I have only two more speakers on my list.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent at the time the Cullop amendment was affixed to this bill. Had I been present, I certainly would have voted against it.

The principle that underlies it is offensive to me as a man and is repugnant to me as a lawyer. As a matter of fact, I think our party has taken an untenable position on this point and it ought to recede.

The idea of the President of the United States being required to tell why he appoints a man to office! I think it would be much more seemly and much more appropriate to require the Members of this House to tell why they appoint their private secretaries. Anyone who has respect for the judiciary, anyone who has respect for the President of the United States, anyone who has respect for the Constitution of the United States, must see the impropriety and unconstitutionality of the proposition advanced by the gentleman from Indiana, and I avail myself of this opportunity to put myself on record as being against it. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I return the balance of my time.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LOGUE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LOGUE] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. LOGUE. Mr. Speaker, I have assumed that, in view of the favorable report of the Committee on the Judiciary, the action of the House, and the action of the Senate, we can conclude that there is a necessity for the additional judge in the eastern district of Pennsylvania. That condition, therefore, being established by the various actions to which I have referred, I view the insistence upon the Cullop amendment as being directed to this special bill and not advanced as a general principle.

We have appointments being made at the present time which are not subject to any such investigation or exploiting of recommendations, and I think it absolutely unfair at this time that this amendment should be attached to this special bill for the purpose of doing that which it necessarily does do—defeat the administration of justice in the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

I do not attach any weight to the suggestion that an honest, faithful judge, unable by physical ailment to longer preside, a man under an income of $6,000 a year, who has given his best hours, who has no resources to fall back upon, shall be the object of dependence by asking him to withdraw from the bench under circumstances such as these.

The business of our district demands the attendance of an additional judge there. Judge Witmer was there for a period of six weeks in the great lumber case; other judges had been brought in for special trials. We are confronted with the bankruptcy business and the numerous ordinary applications. Two judges have been there for years, and they should be there. To take a judge out of another district cripples that district. We are merely asking now for a temporary provision for an additional judge, and that office will automatically cease upon the death of the judge senior in years, that judge being the present incumbent, who is ill. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Indiana will use the rest of his time.

Mr. CULLOP. I am going to have it divided up into two or three parts. I would like to have the gentleman from Alabama use some of his time, alternating with it, if he will.

Mr. CLAYTON. It is my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to yield most of the time I have remaining to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER], and I shall want to reserve one or two minutes at the close for myself.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, whatever may have been the original attitude on the part of any Democratic Member of this House toward the proposition to require that the indorsements, and recommendations upon which presidential appointments have been made, shall be made public, there is one very sufficient reason why we should abide by the action, heretofore, deliberately taken by this body, and that is that we went before the country in the last election with one plank in our platform commending the action of the House in favoring this principle.

In the Baltimore platform, which was adopted after this House had acted upon this proposition, the course of the Democratic Party with respect to this action was specifically commended. In the ensuing election we won on that platform; and no party can hope to sustain itself with the voters, unless it affords a living exemplification of keeping the pledges upon which it has been elected.

Permit me to call the attention of the Democrats of this Chamber to this feature of our party platform. After commending the Democratic House of Representatives for quite a number of things, the platform proceeded to say:

> We commend the Democratic House of Representatives for extending the doctrine of publicity to recommendations, verbal and written, upon which presidential appointments are made.

Nor was the platform limited to a specific indorsement of the Democratic attitude in this respect, but in order to assure the country that what we had declared that we would do, would be done, if the opportunity for action was afforded, we concluded that platform in the following terms:

> Our platform is one of principles which we believe to be essential to our national welfare. Our pledges are made to be kept when in office, as well as relied upon during the campaign, and we invite the cooperation of all citizens regardless of party who believe in maintaining unimpaired the institutions and traditions of our country.

After emphasizing the things that we commended in the record of the Democratic Party, by reciting them in orderly succession, we held out to the people of the entire United States the assurance that if the opportunity for action was given, our party would afford to the world an exemplification of a party that not only made promises with a view to getting into power, but of a party that kept and maintained those promises when once this power was attained. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Has there been any publicity yet of any indorsements that have been made to the President either written or verbal for any appointments that he has so far made?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not know whether there has been or not.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask for information.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I can only reply that I do not know; but the proposition before the House is one which requires a recession on our part from an attitude which we deliberately and with full knowledge assumed, on several occasions. I take it that unless this House is going to make itself ridiculous before the country, we will not yield merely because the Senate stands pat. No sufficient reasons have been afforded why this recession on our part should take place. I am not discussing in this connection the right of Congress to enact a publicity law, for the simple reason that this ground has been covered heretofore. I am not even taking issue at this time—though I am ready to take issue in the forum of argument—with the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ], as to the merits of this proposition; but confine myself for the present, to the proposition that when the Democratic Party takes an attitude in a party platform they have pledged their faith to the people of the United States, and that pledge is not to be lightly withdrawn. There is too much present talk about abandoning and too much apparent readiness to abandon the principles and promises that we included in our platform of 1912. "Pledges are made to be kept when in office, as well as relied upon during the campaign." [Applause.]

Mr. CLAYTON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I am very much in favor of the passage of this bill, because we had in the district of Maryland a situation exactly similar to that which calls for the passage of this measure. Our Judge Morris had served for many years, and very efficiently and ably, but he became ill and was unable to attend to the duties of his office, and the work of the court was tied up for a long time. Finally a bill similar to this was passed by Congress, signed by the President, and Judge Rose was appointed in that district. Judge Rose took up the work very efficiently and began clearing the calendar. Judge Morris continued ill for a long time, and finally departed this life, and Judge Rose took entire charge of the court. The matter worked out so admirably in the State of Maryland that I hope this House will pass this bill, because I believe it is absolutely necessary for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, as it was for our district of Maryland. [Applause.]

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, how much more time have I?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has four minutes and the gentleman from Alabama eight.

Mr. CULLOP. Will not the gentleman from Alabama use some of his time?

Mr. CLAYTON. I hope the gentleman will use his time.

Mr. CULLOP. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON].

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, there are two great fundamental propositions involved in this question. The first proposition is that we have declared for a certain thing in our platform. Shall we yield that because a certain district over in Pennsylvania wants an additional judge? The second question is, Shall we yield to the Senate simply because the Senate wants to violate the Democratic platform? [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I want to quote the Democratic platform at Baltimore in 1912, particularly the part that pertains to this question:

> And we commend the Democratic House of Representatives for extending the doctrine of publicity to recommendations, verbal and written, upon which presidential appointments are made.

Mr. Speaker, if I had it within my power, I would do away with all these Federal judges.

I do not believe in an office-holding aristocracy. If this is a Government of the people, for the people, and by the people, then all power should originate with the people, and certainly no man, be he President, Senator, Congressman, or judge, should set aside the will of the people when solemnly expressed through their Representatives in form of law. Inferior Federal judges have in the past, in the face of law, in the face of public opinion, and in violation of the expressed wish of the people, set aside the views of the people on different public questions as expressed by their Representatives. I have heretofore expressed my opinion of Federal judges, and it was that they should be subject to the wish and will of the people whom they preside over. In my opinion, the creature never becomes greater than the creator, and this is just as true of Federal officers as it is true of State officers.

Mr. Speaker, during the Sixty-second Congress when this House had under consideration H. R. 17595—during the consideration of that bill the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] offered the following amendment:

> Add a new section, as follows: "That hereafter before the President shall appoint any district, circuit, or Supreme Court judge he shall make public all indorsements made in behalf of any applicant."

A roll call was had on that amendment, and every Democratic Member of the House at the time voted in favor of it, with the exception of 13. The vote was as follows:

I note, Mr. Speaker, that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] and the great leader of this House [Mr. UNDERWOOD] voted in favor of the Cullop amendment at that time. I do not understand with what consistency they can come before the House at this time and ask the Democrats to violate a platform pledge made at the Baltimore convention in favor of publicity. Mr. Bryan, the great leader of our party in three great national campaigns—1896, 1900, and 1908—had this to say with reference to the votes of Democrats on that Democratic amendment offered in the Sixty-second Congress by the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

The Cullop amendment reads as follows:

> Hereafter, before the President shall appoint any district, circuit, or supreme judge, he shall make public all indorsements made in behalf of any applicant.

Mr. Bryan said:

> Is there anything in that amendment that an honest man can object to? Why should the President desire to conceal the recommendations upon which he appoints public servants? And why should he be permitted to conceal recommendations if he does desire to do so? The amendment does not interfere with his right to appoint; it simply asks him to step out into the daylight and let the people see to what indorsements he gives weight and what indorsements he ignores. Anything wrong about that?
> The opponents of the amendment say that it is unconstitutional. The objection is ridiculous, but suppose it were a doubtful question? Why not let the court decide the question of constitutionality? If the amendment is desirable, let Congress pass the bill; the Federal courts can be relied upon not to allow the people to have any more light than the Constitution permits. The 13 Democrats opposing the law give the benefit of the doubt to the predatory interests. If the 13 had their way about it, the courts would have no chance to decide the question on the side of the people.
> The 13 Democrats made a mistake—a grievous mistake. With some of them such mistakes are a matter of habit, but some of the 13 are new offenders. It remains to be seen whether they have been misled or have deliberately started on a downward course. Their constituents should write them, demanding an explanation. By the time they get through explaining they will know more. Those Democrats (in the districts represented by the 13 Democrats) who favor the Cullop amendment should make it an issue. It should be indorsed in the congressional platforms in these districts and the candidates should be committed to publicity or left at home. A man who really believes that the President should be permitted to make his appointments on secret recommendations can not be trusted to represent a Democratic constituency.

The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] and the leader of this House [Mr. UNDERWOOD] advise us that we have performed our whole duty in voting in favor of the Cullop amendment during the Sixty-third Congress. I am a little slow to follow the leadership of these distinguished gentlemen, in view of the fact that they have consistently voted against publicity during a Democratic administration, while always voting for it when it was impossible during a Republican administration.

By reference to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 10, 1913, it will be found that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] voted against the Cullop amendment. The vote on the Cullop amendment—that the President shall make public all indorsements in behalf of the person appointed as such district judge—was as follows:

And when the matter was again before the House on July 15, 1913, while there was no record vote, the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] and the great leader of this House [Mr. UNDERWOOD] again voted against the Cullop amendment. I do not see, therefore, Mr. Speaker, how they can consistently at this time oppose the Cullop amendment and say to us that we ought to follow them because we have made our record, because they have always been opposed to publicity, even in the face of the Democratic platform.

For myself, I do not intend to make a promise to the people before election, and refuse to live up to it after the election. I think Mr. Bryan more clearly and forcibly stated this proposition than I possibly can when he said:

A man who really believes that the President should be permitted to make his appointments on secret recommendations can not be trusted to represent a Democratic constituency.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the widest publicity of the actions of this Congress. I am in favor of letting the people know what we do in caucus as well as in Congress. If what I do does not respond to the best interests of the common people—the farmers and the laboring people—they ought to know it, and they ought to send a man here who will in truth and in fact represent their views.

In conclusion, let me say that there ought to be no secret caucus, no vote except when a record is made. The people are entitled to know what we are doing. If we do the right thing we ought to be glad to let the people know we have done right. If we behind closed doors and without a roll call do the wrong thing, the people ought to kick down the doors and find what we are doing. I for one am willing to stand or fall by what is right. Can those who vote against me say as much? I challenge them to the contest. [Applause.]

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman from Alabama use some of his time now? My three minutes will be consumed in one speech.

Mr. CLAYTON. I stated to the gentleman that it was my purpose, really, to have but one more speech. That will be by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER], and I will reserve one or two minutes at the end, in order that I may make a motion.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, no man, except one, has raised the question this time that this proposition is unconstitutional. If it is unconstitutional, the Executives in this Republic for 135 years have failed to find out and recognize that fact. Whenever this question has been presented, no President of this Republic has ever questioned the constitutionality of this proposition. Some of the greatest controversies that have ever occurred in the entire history of the Republic have arisen over questions similar to this. This was one of the great contests that arose between President Cleveland and the United States Senate. Surely our Republican friends do not contend that it is unconstitutional. They passed the tenure-of-office act, which went further than this. It not only required the President to make public all indorsements of candidates, but to make public the grounds upon which he removed any official in this Republic; so that, when neither the House nor any Executive of this Republic has ever questioned the constitutionality of this measure, it seems to me it is too late for any Member to raise that question now. By common practice it is otherwise established. This proposition is one of fundamental principle. This Congress has a right to formulate laws governing the action of any officer in this Republic as long as it does not take from him any of his prerogatives. This takes none. It only prescribes the manner in which the appointment to a judgeship can be made. Other laws of a similar nature are upon the statute books, and the Executives of this country have followed them throughout their existence. Why should a special case be made here? Would any candidate for appointment to a judgeship feel ashamed to have the Chief Executive make public his indorsement? Would any Chief Executive of this Republic be embarrassed to give to the country the indorsements upon which he filled any appointive office that he is called upon to fill? If either one of these reasons existed why publicity should not be made, it would be the strongest reason why the appointment itself should not be made. The fact is there have been criticisms of our courts—criticisms about the way in which the judges have received their appointments. This is an imputation against the courts. This amendment seeks to remove that imputation—to let the public know upon what indorsements the appointments of our Federal judges are made. Should any Executive, any candidate, or any man in this Republic oppose such a procedure as that? It will remove all unjust criticism of courts and purify the judicial atmosphere.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eight minutes.

Mr. CLAYTON. I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER].

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I have found it difficult to understand the position and the conduct of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] in respect to this measure. He has, however, thrown some little light upon it this morning. Originally he started out with the virtuous and patriotic attempt to keep his party in line behind a platform declaration and devoted all his efforts during the previous discussions of this measure to the merits of the so-called Cullop amendment, advocating with his usual ability and force the proposition that the widest publicity should be given to the indorsements received by the President of all candidates for Federal judges.

To-day, however, doubtless feeling that having put the House upon record twice on this proposition he has accomplished everything for his party and its fidelity to the platform pledges which may be required of him, he now says that he is against this bill on its merits, that he does not believe that there ought to be an additional judge in the eastern district of Pennsylvania. He argues that it looks to him as though it was simply an effort to find a job for some Democrat in Pennsylvania.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say that this proposition was not mine; it did not come from a Democrat; it did not come from a Democratic Member of this House. On the contrary, the Philadelphia Bar Association, officered throughout by great Republican lawyers in the city of Philadelphia, passed resolutions asking for the appointment of this judge. They sent their committee to Washington, and it appeared before the Judiciary Committee. I simply introduced the bill at their request. There is no politics in it. Philadelphia does not believe that there is any politics in it.

There is a widespread and crying demand for justice in our State, and the efforts of lawyers and business men, without regard to politics, are being made to create this additional judgeship.

Now, gentlemen, when the gentleman from Indiana was asked by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] whether a general bill would be reported by the Judiciary Committee upon this proposition, he threw additional light upon his motives and position by declaring that even then he would not agree to give up this amendment to the Philadelphia judgeship bill. Talk about standing by party pledges. Is it possible that the Baltimore platform can be strained into a denial of the support of a piece of general legislation and twist it over when it may simply punish one judicial district in the country?

Why, that platform had no earthly reference to this particular judgeship. And yet the gentleman from Indiana refuses to give his valuable support to the general proposition before the Judiciary Committee, because, as he says, it is a proposition which will put a Democrat on the bench in Philadelphia.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. When this amendment was offered the first time it was on a special bill for a judgeship in Chicago.

Mr. PALMER. Yes; and what happened to it? The House adopted it, the Senate disagreed to it, and the House lay down, because it had done all that it could.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman is mistaken, and the record shows it. The House stood by it on a roll call and defeated the bill.

Mr. PALMER. It is not in the law.

Mr. CULLOP. No; because the bill did not pass.

Mr. PALMER. The gentleman is mistaken; it went out in conference and the House agreed to the conference report.

Mr. CULLOP. In that I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. PALMER. That is my recollection about it, and it is the recollection of others seated about me.

Mr. CULLOP. I still think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. PALMER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say this in answer to the criticism of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN]. I think it is a very ungracious position for a gentleman to take that when a man has devoted his life to the service of his country, finding that he is absolutely incapacitated for further service, to tell him that to be patriotic now he must efface himself and resign; go to the poorhouse. I say it is ungracious, it is unfair, it is un-American. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves the previous question on his motion.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 144, nays 139, answered "present" 3, not voting 147, as follows:

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, Thursday next, February 12, is the anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln. That day has already been set aside for the consideration of business of the District of Columbia, but I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio, Dr. FESS, have leave to address the House for 30 minutes on the subject of Abraham Lincoln, immediately after the reading of the Journal on that day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that on Thursday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] be granted 30 minutes in which to address the House on the subject of President Lincoln. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Irrigation and Arid Lands be discharged from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11622) to provide water for the irrigable lands of the Yakima Indian Reservation, State of Washington, and for other purposes, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I will say that I have consulted with the chairman of the Committee on Irrigation and Arid Lands, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH], and he concurs in the request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

RURAL POST ROADS.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11686, the good roads bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11686, with Mr. RUBEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state for the information of the committee that on Saturday last when the committee rose the first section of the bill had been read for amendment under the five-minute rule.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all between the word "that" in line 6 on page 1 and the word "shall" in line 8 on page 1 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Of said amount there may be expended in each State in each fiscal year $65,000, and a portion of the remainder of said $25,000,000, which."

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which has been read is a committee amendment, and has for its purpose the changing of this bill so that each State will receive at least $100,000. The theory of the committee is that the Agricultural Department can not economically administer a smaller sum than $100,000 in each State. Under this provision each State will first receive $65,000, and then the remainder of the fund will be distributed as provided in the bill. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. LORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] that this bill is drawn upon the theory that the funds appropriated by the Federal Government be distributed one-half upon the basis of mileage of post roads and one-half on the basis of population. If the bill were a pure post-roads bill, in strict compliance with the Democratic platform, it would all be distributed upon the basis of the mileage of post roads, and therefore this amendment would not be necessary. The amendment grows out of the fact, evidently, that half of the money is distributed upon the basis of population. I want to say to the gentleman that there is not any real connection between population and rural roads, for the reason that population is largely massed in the cities, and the cities are not expected to benefit directly in the distribution of this money. It is expected to improve rural roads. I have a substitute which I intend to offer for this entire section and a substitute which I intend to offer for the bill, which is drafted upon the theory of appropriating Federal money jointly for two purposes—one half on the basis of post roads and the other half on the basis of traffic roads. In other words, not to confine it purely to post roads, as it is here in the first paragraph, but to divide the money, one-half on the basis of post-roads mileage and one-half on the proportion that the production of commodities in a State bears to the production of commodities in the Nation. Gentlemen will see the proposed substitute in the RECORD of Saturday, and it strikes me that it is a fairer division of the Federal money if we frankly and honestly acknowledge what we are seeking to obtain is to improve the rural roads for both postal purposes and traffic or market purposes.

In other words, the basis of population is not the basis on which we ought to figure. It is true our New York friends and our other big-city friends might say that they contribute a large amount to the taxable wealth of the Nation and that that wealth is taken and used partly upon the rural routes in Montana or Missouri or Colorado. But my reply to that is, that New York, being a great market town and the metropolis of the Nation, does business with the products that are raised in Montana, Colorado, and Missouri, and she is vitally interested not only in the carriage of the mail in those States but in the production of commodities there and in their getting to market in Colorado, Montana, and Missouri. And those are the things she is interested in, and not in the question of population alone, for the large cities are doing business on commodities from States with a small and scattered population.

A true basis upon which to divide the money for Federal purposes is either on the basis of post roads purely, or make it a market-road proposition on the basis of commodities produced within the State. And I undertake to say, as I know the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] will say, that his State will not suffer in comparison with any State west of the Mississippi River.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, of course I would not undertake the discussion of a measure like this under the five-minute rule, but I desire to express my approval of the provisions of this bill, and I am especially gratified that its terms are almost identical with those of a bill introduced in the House by myself some time ago. Some have objected to this bill on the ground that it is not constitutional. That question, however, needs no discussion. The power conferred by the Constitution to establish post offices and post roads is a direct authority to the Congress by whatever method it may deem proper in legislation to establish these roads. It was my pleasure previously in the House to discuss at length the constitutional features of the proposed road laws, at a time when the subject was not so well nor thoroughly considered as it has since been. The power of Congress can not be questioned. Whether we shall develop this dormant power under the Constitution or leave it untouched by the hand of legislation is one of the issues that we must consider. I have always believed it wise, in order that the line of demarkation between the jurisdiction of States and the Federal Government should be clear, that the Federal Government should develop completely all of its constitutional powers. I know of no better way in which one of the powers it possesses can be used for the benefit of the people than by the establishment and maintenance of post roads. This bill does not in any way deprive the States of their power or control over the roads. It only confers Federal aid for the maintenance of post roads. With the power to enact legislation settled comes the question of expediency. That all living in the rural districts may have good and rapid mail facilities ought to be a matter of great concern.

The incidental benefits that arise as the result of the exercise of this Federal power are most beneficial. It would bring the farmers' products nearer to the market; it will produce a more rapid interchange of commodities; it will make more stable and fixed prices for products; and commercially, agriculturally, and socially it would be of great benefit to the people. This question settled, the wisdom of legislation to accomplish these results is apparent. We have spent many millions of money annually upon our rivers and harbors, and we ought to continue to do so until we have completed the system of waterways in the interest of the commerce of the country, but the benefits to be derived from these waterways would be very greatly minimized if we shall not adopt some policy by which the country roads leading to them may be improved that commerce may be borne thither for transportation to the markets of the country. It may be said that the Federal Government, with its limited powers, has no right to build roads for the purpose of facilitating commerce and increasing the values of lands along the roadways. This is true if that were all that is involved in the matter, but when this comes as a necessary and inevitable result of the exercise of the constitutional power to build roads for the purpose of carrying the mails, the incidental benefits should be gladly accepted, even if in their force and effectiveness for good they are greater than the direct benefit conferred by the exercise of the power under the Constitution. It is because it is constitutional, because it is beneficial, and because we are able and capable of conferring these benefits upon the people that I most heartily approve this legislation.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute to the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] and to have it pending, so that it may be considered in connection with that amendment.

I will say in that connection that it includes the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado, which I favor, and also another amendment relating to certain administrative features of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] offers a substitute for the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the semicolon in line 6 on page 1, down to and including the word "year" in line 6 on page 2, and insert the following:

"That out of said sum which may be so expended in any fiscal year shall be paid the expenses incurred by the Secretary of Agriculture in the administration of this act, and that to administer the provisions of this act he is authorized to employ such engineering and other assistance and incur such expenses, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, as may be necessary; that after deducting from said $25,000,000 a sum sufficient to pay the expenses of administering this act by the Secretary of Agriculture, the portion of the remainder which may be expended in any State in any fiscal year under the provisions of this act shall be determined upon the following basis, to wit:

"Sixty-five thousand dollars in each State and the balance in the respective States, one-half in the ratio to which their total population bears to the total population of all the States, as shown by the next preceding Federal census, and one-half in the ratio which their total mileage of rural post roads bears to the total mileage of rural post roads in all of the States, as shown by the report of the Postmaster General at the close of second quarter of the last preceding fiscal year.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am like a great many other Members of this House, in that this good-roads bill does not exactly suit me. I had a bill of my own, about which I talked to the committee, but I said at that time that I was ready to support any good-roads measure reported to this House, and therefore I stand ready to support this bill. I am particularly pleased to note that in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado and the substitute offered by the gentleman from Virginia some recognition has been given to the smaller and to the less populous States in the Union. There are, as the bill was reported to the House, 11 States that would receive less than $150,000 under this bill. To my mind, that was as small a sum as any State could profitably use. The committee has cut my estimate to $100,000, but I am willing to accept that, because I want to see some money appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States for the improvement of roads, and I believe now is the time to do it. Some days ago I addressed a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Roads, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD:

JANUARY 29, 1914.

Hon. DORSEY W. SHACKLEFORD,
Chairman Committee on Roads, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: The supplemental report on H. R. 11686 shows that the maximum amount of Federal aid which any of the following States can possibly receive under the provisions of this bill as reported by your committee is less than $150,000.

Arizona	$55,000
Delaware	53,750
Idaho	112,500
Montana	128,750
Nevada	42,500
New Hampshire	125,000
New Mexico	100,000
Rhode Island	83,750
Utah	88,750
Vermont	138,750
Wyoming	65,000

I am confident that your committee must have unintentionally overlooked the question of a minimum amount which any State should receive, because it is evident that the sums listed above are so small that they offer no inducement to such States to comply with the provisions of the act.

In my opinion $150,000 is the least amount that should be apportioned to any State, and I therefore suggest the following amendment, which will accomplish that result:

Amend by striking out all between the word "that," in line 6, page 1, and the word "shall," in line 8, page 1, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Of said amount there may be expended in each State in each fiscal year $115,000 and a portion of the remainder of said $25,000,000 which."

I realize that this bill is in the nature of an experiment and that no State can possibly receive all of the money from the Federal Treasury that it could profitably use on its roads. If in the judgment of the committee $150,000 is a larger minimum amount than can be allotted to each State, then the amount of $115,000, as given in my proposed amendment, can be reduced. If the base amount is fixed at $100,000, the State of Nevada, now receiving the smallest sum under your bill, will be entitled to $134,340. If the amount is further reduced to $75,000, the total for this State will be $111,380. Certainly the committee will not arrange matters so that any State will be allotted less than $100,000; but if you should determine that this sum is about as much as the committee can provide, then $65,000 as a basis will yield to the State of Nevada $102,196.

I sincerely trust that the Committee on Roads will favorably consider an amendment to H. R. 11686 in the manner in which I have suggested.

Yours, very truly,

CARL HAYDEN,
Member of Congress from Arizona.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] offers an amendment to the substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the last seven lines of the substitute and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"One-half in the proportion that the mileage of the post roads within the State bears to the total mileage of post roads in the United States, exclusive of star routes, and one-half in the proportion that the commodities produced within the State bear to the total production of commodities in the United States."

Mr. FRANCIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FRANCIS. I would like a definition of the word "commodities" as it is used in that amendment.

Mr MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. What is the gentleman's idea of cutting out the star routes? They are rural routes.

Mr. BORLAND. I will answer the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FRANCIS] first. The word "commodities" does not need any definition. It is a plain English word, and the statistics are available as to the quantity of production in each State, both from State sources and from national sources, and it does not depend upon the quantity that is marketed in the State. This is confined to the quantity produced in the State, which means the total of farm products, the total of the output of the mines, the amount of live stock, the amount of lumber, and the amount of commodities entering into interstate commerce that are produced in that State. The marketing may occur elsewhere, and it is just exactly on that point that the interstate interest of the United States occurs on the movements of commodities to market. We might just as well face this question frankly. What we are here for is not primarily to improve post roads. My colleague from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] got up here the other day—a gentleman who has served for many years on the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads—and said that a majority of the roads in Missouri would not come up to Class C. Another member of the Post Office Committee, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY], also a distinguished Member, said that the regulations of the Post Office Department forbade the carrying of a rural route over any road that was not up to Class C. Those two gentlemen were in total disagreement as to whether there were or were not classifications now proposed for post roads up to class C. So evidently we are here frankly facing the proposition of making a market road. The post-road proposition is a part of it, and I presume not more than 50 per cent of the balance is the amount needed to move commodities from the place of production to market. Most of the States which are large producing States are not large consuming States. Their commodities go to other States. Many of the States that are large consuming and exporting States are not large producing States.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Would not the gentleman's amendment give over a half on the latter proposition by reason of manufactures which never see a public road?

Mr. SAUNDERS. And shipments of coal and iron ore?

Mr. BORLAND. No. In my judgment, the tonnage of farm products is the largest tonnage. Next to them are the products of the mine, and next to that are the products of the forest. Those are the three ranking products of our country.

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman's amendment say in proportion to the tonnage or in proportion to the products?

Mr. BORLAND. In proportion to quantity of the products.

Mr. HARDY. Are not the manufacturing products more than the farm products?

Mr. BORLAND. They may be in value, but certainly not in quantity.

[Mr. SHACKLEFORD addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not object to that, but I am advised by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and other leaders in the House that we should get this little bill out of the way for the appropriations that are to come.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not object after the personal attack he has made on me.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It was not a personal attack. I just read the gentleman's bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Oh, no; it was not a personal attack. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I have no objection, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman will proceed.

[Mr. BORLAND addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. What became of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado offered an amendment, and the gentleman from Virginia offers a substitute, to which the gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Is another amendment in order at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the original amendment is in order.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, we have had some fireworks on both sides, and the honors are about even. I should like to hear the gentleman from Virginia, or the gentleman from Colorado who offered the substitute, explain the reason and the necessity for it. What is the purpose of these amendments? It looks to me as though you had worked out a very nice plan. Why do you propose to disturb it? What do you propose in your amendments?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If the gentleman will allow me to answer that——

Mr. COX. I shall be glad to have an answer from anybody who is in charge of this bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It was considered that some of the States would receive very small sums under this apportionment.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman enumerate those States that it is proposed to aid?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Nevada, Delaware, Arizona, Wyoming, Rhode Island, and Utah would receive very small sums. The committee on consideration concluded that the Secretary of Agriculture could not efficiently expend so small a sum. It was thought that $65,000 would be as small a sum as could be well handled, so we gave the flat sum of $65,000 to each State, and then apportioned the balance among all the States, according to the plan in the bill. Under the original plan one State would get only $42,000, while another State would get $1,500,000.

Mr. COX. I want to know the reason why that amendment is offered, because I am for the gentleman's bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I understand.

Mr. COX. I thought he had worked out a very complete and symmetrical plan.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The reason was that $42,000 was too small a sum with which to try to do anything.

Mr. COX. Would $42,000 have been the amount that these six States would have received under the plan as reported in the bill?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. One of them.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The States which are referred to, would have variously received small sums. One of them would receive $42,000.

Mr. COX. Was $42,000 the maximum?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No; that was the minimum under the first plan of apportionment.

Mr. COX. What State would get that?

Mr. KEATING. Nevada would receive the smallest amount.

Mr. COX. That State would have received $42,000 under the bill as reported.

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. COX. Has the gentleman any figures to show whether or not this proposed amendment will destroy the equilibrium of the bill as originally reported?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I can answer that.

Mr. COX. I wish you would inform the committee on that.

Mr. SAUNDERS. This amendment will not in anywise disturb the scheme of distribution upon which the bill is made. It will take a slight amount away from some States, in order to bring certain smaller States up to the minimum that has been considered wise. This minimum will be $100,000, on a basis of $25,000,000.

Mr. COX. Let me ask you right in this connection, after you have given these various States this $65,000, will they further share in any part of this distribution?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes. The effect of this amendment will be to bring every State in the Union up to a minimum of about $100,000; and we thought that this was fair, because the general purpose of the bill is to make road improvement universal throughout the United States.

Mr. COX. Then, if I understand the gentleman's theory correctly, these six States will get a lump sum of $65,000 each.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Each one of the States will in the first instance receive a lump sum of $65,000.

Mr. COX. And then, over and above that, they will receive proportionate amounts of whatever may be left?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; according to the fixed scheme of apportionment prescribed by the bill.

Mr. COX. In proportion to population and also in proportion to the rural routes in each State, as compared to the total number?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes. If you wish to know the exact effect in dollars and cents upon the other States of this amendment I will say that under its effect all of the States in the Union, outside of six States will, in the aggregate, receive about $240,000, less than they would receive under the bill as reported. The amendment merely provides in effect that no State shall receive less than $100,000.

Mr. CARTER. Altogether.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; in the aggregate.

Mr. COX. It will deduct $200,000 or $240,000 from the total amount that would otherwise go to all the States, save the six in question.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. TREADWAY. I understood the gentleman to say that it would make $200,000 less, except from the six small States.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; say about $240,000.

Mr. TREADWAY. It will change the apportionment, as shown on page 4 of the committee's report, by $200,000 in each case?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Oh, no, no. By about $240,000 in the aggregate. It will only make a difference of a few thousand dollars in the apportionment of some of the States.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask if the schedule of the amount has been revised in accordance with the amendment now offered?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No, it has not; but we know exactly what is necessary to be done to bring these six States up to $100,000, and it is easy enough for any Member of the House to work out the effect of this amendment upon any particular State. The amount of loss to the larger States is negligible.

Mr. TREADWAY. I want to ask one further question. It may have been answered in the questions that were put over on that side, but we could not hear everything that was said. In what way do you determine that the amount of $65,000 should be allowed each State?

Mr. SAUNDERS. It was necessary to take an arbitrary amount in order to work out the minimum of $100,000 for each State. The arbitrary amount to be given to each one of all of the States in order to secure the result I have mentioned is $65,000. The balance of the appropriation is then divided according to the scheme of distribution among all of the States. When this is done no State will receive less than $100,000. After we have given each State $65,000, then the balance, as I have said, is distributed amongst all the States, including the six States. The effect of this on the larger States is negligible.

Mr. PARKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. PARKER. I would like to ask the gentleman what is a post road—what is the definition of a post road?

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is defined by the United States statutes as any road over which mail is carried, whether by star or rural carrier.

Mr. PARKER. Is it not any road that is improved, whether used for carrying the mail or not?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Does the gentleman mean potentially?

Mr. PARKER. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The roads referred to may be potentially post roads. The ordinary acceptation of the term is a road used for the transportation of mail.

Mr. PARKER. I think it is important to know just what a post road is. My interpretation of the law is that it is any improved highway.

Mr. COX. Oh, no; a post road is a road over which the United States mail is carried.

Mr. SAUNDERS. So far as that is concerned, if the gentleman wants to offer an amendment extending it over these roads he can do so.

Mr. PARKER. I think the bill covers it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. In common acceptation a post road is a road over which the United States mail is transported.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I notice by the bill that the State is to provide an amount equal to that appropriated by the United States Government.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Suppose the State does not appropriate or provide that amount?

Mr. SAUNDERS. In such a case a State will be benefited to the extent only to which it provides an equivalent amount. If a State is entitled to $500,000 and desires to secure the full benefit of that amount, then such a State must appropriate $500,000, or at least $500,000 must be afforded by the State or otherwise.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will.

Mr. LANGLEY. There is no provision in this bill under which, if the State for any reason fails to act and the governor fails to act, the county can secure its pro rata share of what the State would have been entitled to if it had not failed to appropriate.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The application must be made on the part of the State.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, there is an amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado and a substitute to that offered by the gentleman from Virginia and an amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MONDELL. Would a substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri be in order at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. It would not at this time. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Virginia, striking out all that portion of his substitute that fixes a basis for the apportionment and insert the following.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the last seven lines of the substitute and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"One-third in the proportion which the total population of such State bears to the total population of all the States; one-third in the proportion which the total number of miles of rural post roads in use in such State bears to the total number of miles in all the States; and one-third in proportion which the total area of such State bears to the total area of all the States."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, as the bill now stands, the proposition is to divide this fund on the basis of population and length of rural post roads. That ignores entirely the exceedingly important question of area, and would give to a small State with a few miles of road and large population a very large amount of the fund, leaving a State of vast area with a comparatively small population with little of the fund. Under the bill as it now stands, I think the State I have the honor to represent upon the floor of this House would receive less than $50,000.

Mr. HOWARD. Fifty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. MONDELL. It has 98,000 square miles of territory. An allotment of that kind is ridiculous; it is not worth while to discuss it; it would not make a start anywhere; it would not be of any benefit worth considering, and my proposition to consider area as one of the elements of the equation is entirely fair and sound, in my opinion, and I hope that the committee will adopt this amendment.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] evidently does not appreciate the fact that the purpose of this road bill is that the Government shall help those who help themselves. The States in the Union that have been derelict in improving their roads—in many instances on the theory advocated by the gentleman from Wyoming—would get more money than those which have expended large amounts in the construction of good roads. The purpose of the bill, as I said before, is to encourage people everywhere to help themselves to good roads, and in communities where this has not been done they will not get so much in the beginning of this legislation, but if they show the proper spirit of enterprise the time will soon come, after they have shown a desire to help themselves, that they will get as much benefit under this bill as the most populous State in the Union.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. It is not because we have not spent money for roads in these great States that we are not adequately provided for in this bill, but because we have not population. I have not any question but that the people of my State have spent more money for roads every year, in proportion to population, than the people of the State from which the gentleman comes.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I can answer readily by saying that I appreciate the fact that a good deal of land in the State represented by the gentleman is reserved by the Government, and such does not have any population; but the way to get more roads is to increase your population.

Mr. MONDELL. But you can not very well increase the population while the country is reserved, and we must build roads over and adjacent to the reserved area.

Mr. BARNHART. Yes; the gentleman's State is in the same condition that all the other States in the Union have been at some time during their progress. The State is comparatively new. They may have expended as much per capita out there, but not as much in the aggregate, as Ohio, New York, or Pennsylvania. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it would not be fair to those other States that have expended so much money that a State of larger area should come in and get more money than those which have expended such vast sums on their road improvements.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, of course we all understand that this bill is to encourage the building of better roads in the thoroughly civilized and more thickly populated States of the Union. [Laughter.] None of this money, of course, will be expended upon trails and none of it will be expended indiscreetly through the great deserts of the West.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman has suggested that the roads should not be built in the desert country. What would the gentleman think of building roads in a country where illiteracy prevails?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, if they would build some roads in the State of the gentleman [Colorado] I think they would build them where a good deal of illiteracy prevails.

Mr. KEATING. But the census report would not bear the gentleman out.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know of any other section where it prevails to a greater extent than in the gentleman's State.

Mr. KEATING. How about Georgia?

Mr. HOWARD. Georgia will compare favorably with the gentleman's State in every way. But that is beside the mark. The question to which I arose to address myself is this: The gentleman from Arizona contends that the Government should make an appropriation to aid the State, from the standpoint of area.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman from Wyoming, the gentleman means.

Mr. HOWARD. Wyoming. I beg the pardon of the gentleman from Arizona. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, clearly it would not be of any benefit if the gentleman from Wyoming got more than $55,000 a year.

As a matter of fact, that would not help him any, for this reason, that if they did not have any people there they would not need any roads, and that is the trouble.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I regret very much to cut off this flow of oratory, but I make the point of order that debate on this proposition has already been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado can not take the gentleman from Georgia off the floor in that manner. The gentleman from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, to meet the captious objection of my good friend from Colorado, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I think under that I shall be permitted to contend for five minutes longer than I have already consumed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed three minutes. He is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, the proposition resolves itself into this: This is a mere rental that the Government of the United States pays to the States for the use of the rural routes, and I assume that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has only a sufficient number of rural routes in his State to get, under the provisions of this bill, $55,000. That is the maximum amount to which he is entitled. That is presumed to be predicated upon a basis of sixty, thirty, and fifteen dollars per mile for each mile of rural route that he has in the State.

Down in the great State of Georgia we have about 39,000 miles of rural routes, and we will get under the provisions of this bill a maximum of $771,000. Now, that is simply an illustration, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, of what civilization and population means to a State. And when they get this population and they need roads out in the good State of Wyoming, my friend will get the roads. And when he establishes rural routes and people are living along the rural routes and it is necessary for this Government to spend money on those roads, they will spend it. What is the use of sinking any more money in the great State of Wyoming? What good would it do? Nobody would use the roads.

Mr. MANN. How can you sink it in the rocks?

Mr. HOWARD. They can not sink it. That is the truth about it, and that is the situation. [Laughter.]

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] and our other southern friends, I desire to call attention to the fact that many of the Western States have set an example that other States interested in good roads would do well to follow. We have not waited for Government aid, but have appropriated our own money, which is the best evidence of our keen interest in the subject.

The great State of California, for instance, which I have the honor to in part represent, and where, I believe, more automobiles are now owned than in any other State, in 1910 voted the sum of $18,000,000 for the construction of good roads throughout the length and breadth of that Commonwealth. The movement for good-roads legislation in California was initiated by the then governor, Hon. James N. Gillett, and the highway act has since been successfully administered by his successor. The amount carried in this bill for California—$503,750—is infinitesimal when compared with what the people of that State are doing. There may be other States which have appropriated sums as large for road building, but there is no State that has appropriated in the same manner. In most of the States the appropriation extends over a number of years, but in California the entire $18,000,000 is available just as fast as it can be utilized.

The California act, which was submitted to the people of the State and ratified by a vote of 93,297 in favor to 80,509 against, provided that the route or routes of said State highways should be selected by the department of engineering, and that the route should be so selected and said highways so laid out and constructed or acquired as to constitute a continuous and connected State highway system running north and south through the State, traversing the Sacramento and San Joaquin Valleys and along the Pacific coast by the most direct and practical routes, connecting the county seats of the several counties through which it passes, and joining the centers of population. Such branch roads as might be necessary to connect with the several county seats lying east and west of such State highway were also provided for.

While the law limits the discretion of the commission in the matter of locating the highways, it gives freedom in the matter of spending the money and the time in which the work may be accomplished.

The California highway system compels the building of about 1,800 miles of trunk roads and about 900 miles of laterals. One of these routes will, as far as practical, follow the old Camino Real, the King's Highway, connecting the famous Franciscan missions of California.

The bill now under consideration provides that the Secretary of Agriculture may aid the States in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads, such aid not to exceed $25,000,000 in any one fiscal year.

The distribution of the $25,000,000 is determined upon the following basis: One-half in the proportion which the total population of such State bears to the total population of all of the States, and one-half in the proportion which the total number of miles of rural post roads in such States bears to the total number of miles of rural post roads in use in all of the States, provided that no State shall receive less than $65,000 per fiscal year.

Section 2 provides that on or before January 1 of each fiscal year the governor of each State may elect whether Federal aid shall be given by filing a written statement of such election.

A special provision for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1914, requires such election to be made 45 days after the passage of the act.

Section 3 authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to cooperate with the officers of the various States and in company with them decide—between February 1 and June 30 of each fiscal year—just what improvements, and so forth, shall be made in the forthcoming year.

The United States shall in no case bear more than one-half the cost of the construction of any road and that work shall not begin until the portion of the cost which is to be provided other than by the United States is available.

Section 4 divides the classes of roads into three—A, B, and C.

Class A are roads which shall have a road track of macadam or other material of equal utility or cost.

Class B are roads which shall have a road track of shells, gravel, or a combination of sand and clay, less expensive than macadam.

Class C are roads constructed so as to quickly shed water into the side ditches. These roads must be kept reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles.

On or before the 1st day of March in each fiscal year the governor of any State may file in the office of the Secretary of Agriculture a statement showing the work to be done, with estimates and classification of the roads into classes A, B, or C.

The Secretary of Agriculture shall decide into what class the roads fall and so notify the governors of the various States.

The United States shall pay on each mile in class A, $60; on each mile in class B, $30; and on each mile in class C, $15, provided the aggregate of said sums does not exceed the amount apportioned to said State. If such is the case, the said sums per mile shall be reduced pro rata. The United States shall pay nothing for roads other than in the three classes named above.

If the State fails to meet its half of the obligations, the United States shall not pay anything.

The Secretary of Agriculture is given the power to make all needful rules for the proper carrying out of the act, which is to become effective July 1, 1914.

I support this measure not because of what my State receives, for the amount is small and will make little impression on California, but I vote for it because it gives an impetus to the general movement throughout the country for good roads. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I will say to the members of the committee that this was a problem over which the committee struggled for some time. I am frank to say that at one time I offered in the committee and advocated the principle established by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. But after a careful comparison of the benefits to be derived under that provision by the various States I was compelled in my own judgment to surrender on that proposition, for the very apparent reason that it is unfair. If you will take the pains to go through the allotment that would be made under that division you will find that many of the sparsely populated States of the Union would receive the largest amount of appropriation. For instance, Texas would receive some $200,000 more than the State of New York under that provision, and I was compelled to surrender my judgment on that matter after a careful study of the question.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not possible that Texas needs roads more than the State of New York?

Mr. PROUTY. I do not entirely yield to the proposition that the appropriation should be made entirely upon the question of necessity. If you take that as a basis, I concede that Wyoming needs it. But I recognize an element of fairness in the distribution of these funds. I recognize the fact that funds ought to be distributed with some relation, at least, to the men who contribute them. Otherwise, taxation is wrong. It never hurts to tax people if you distribute the benefits fairly in proportion to the amount they contribute, and we have tried so far as we can, not with absolute precision, to give to the States benefits in some proportion at least, to the amount that they contribute. And if anyone will take the list which I hold in my hand and go over it he will easily satisfy himself that the proposition of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is unfair to the men and the States that contribute a very large proportion of this fund. And I think if the gentleman will go over the list as I did—and I am revealing no committee secret when I say I advocated at one time and worked hard on this proposition—he will find that it is not tenable.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PROUTY. With pleasure.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Under the bill as it stands Iowa would get $935,000, according to the estimate. Under the gentleman's calculation, which I understood him to say he made, would Iowa get that much if the proposition embodied in the present amendment is adopted?

Mr. PROUTY. Not quite.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I understand it is better for Iowa than it would be with the amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. Very little. But I want to resent the insinuation of the gentleman that I am standing here and voting for it because it will affect or not affect my State. I have not even looked to see whether it affected or did not affect my State. I will ask the gentleman whether he has been equally fair with himself.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I desire to answer the question.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. A parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Is it in order to offer a substitute at this point?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that the debate on this amendment has been exhausted. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and substitute——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I make the point of order against that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] as amended by the substitute.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, strike out the words "and the civil subdivisions thereof."

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, this proposition for the Federal Government to deal directly with the civil subdivisions of the States is a very novel proposition to me. I have heard gentlemen in their zeal to get appropriations—gentlemen who claimed to be earnest State rights' men—present very plausible theories to this House to the effect that it was not against State rights. But how on earth can any gentleman reconcile the dealing by the Federal Government with the civil subdivisions of the States as being anything else than going over the heads of the States?

The Secretary of Agriculture, in a very comprehensive statement which he made on this subject, laid down finally and conclusively the proposition that, in his judgment, the Nation should deal with no smaller unit than the State.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to send to the Clerk's desk and have read in my own time an editorial that appeared in a leading Democratic paper in my own county, a paper not published in the city, but published in a county seat by a gentleman who for many years has been secretary of the Democratic Press Association of Missouri, a very independent and able Democratic editor in the State, the Hon. William Southern. His editorial relates to this very question as to whether the present system of road construction will produce better roads or whether the people need a better system of roads.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows.

ROADS AND PORK BARREL.

In big headlines a few days ago it was announced that Congressman DORSEY W. SHACKLEFORD's bill for Government aid in road building would appropriate approximately $25,000,000 a year for good roads and that it had been attached as a rider on an appropriation bill. At the magic cry of good roads everybody has a glow of self-righteousness about the heart, especially if the Government is going to furnish the money and it makes no extra taxes. There are at least a million men in Missouri who were the first good roads advocates and who have been fighting for good roads for a generation, most of whom live on a road where at any time for the past 25 years half a day's work with a team would have fixed that crossing at the creek.

If, as seems to be the case from the newspaper reports, Congressman SHACKLEFORD's bill simply appropriates $25,000,000 to be distributed among the States, and by the States among the counties, to be spent by local authorities, under local conditions, it would be a criminal waste of money. A million dollars is said to be Missouri's share. A million dollars would give each county in the State about $8,000. This amount spent by the ordinary court, after being divided according to political pull amongst the townships where it would do the most good at the August primaries, would disappear like a frost before a hot sun and no trace be left. Jackson County alone spends nearly a million dollars on roads in a year, and after 25 years there are still some thousands of miles of road to be improved. Applied on one road the $8,000 would build about a mile of good graded rock road in Jackson County, and perhaps a mile and a half in some counties where the grades are not so heavy or the roads built so well. The proposed appropriation smells of "pork-barrel" methods clear from Washington.

The rivers and harbors appropriations and the public building appropriations ought to be an object lesson fragrant enough to warn our statesmen with votes against adding a post roads scandal to our national pork-barrel disgrace. Missouri apportioned half a million dollars in cash to the roads of the various counties a few years ago, and no man can to-day, or could the following year, show one single permanent road improvement for the expenditure of this money. The day has arrived when the people expect the men in office to use ordinary business sense in spending the money and not use it to promote personal political ambitions.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. ALEXANDER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate announced the passage by that body with amendments of bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 7951. An act to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture; and

H. R. 8667. An act to promote the efficiency of the Naval Militia, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3419. An act admitting to citizenship and fully naturalizing George Edward Lerrigo, of the city of Topeka, in the State of Kansas.

RURAL POST ROADS.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] has expired.

[Mr. SHACKLEFORD addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto is exhausted.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire recognition as a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] is recognized, but all debate is exhausted on this amendment.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] can well afford to disregard the snarl of the editorial which has been read at the desk, in view of this most capital piece of legislation that has been reported from the committee of which he is the chairman. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia move to strike out the last word?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SAUNDERS. A good deal of criticism of this bill proceeds from an absolute lack of acquaintance with its contents and its purpose. Some of these criticisms are conflicting and inconsistent. For instance one gentleman has attacked its alleged extravagance, and described it as a pork barrel, of colossal dimensions. Then the gentleman from California rises to remark that this bill carries so little for his State, that really California's quota is negligible. In view of the fact that California has provided a great sum to be expended on roads in that State, the gentleman sneers at a bill which carries only $25,000,000 for the entire United States. Of course to a State that handles so many millions, the sum of $500,000 is an insignificant trifle. But both criticisms can not be well taken. If this bill is objectionable on the ground that it appropriates an unconscionable amount, then it does not deserve the criticism of the gentleman from California, that the sums which it carries for the several States are really negligible and unworthy of consideration.

I desire now to call the attention of the committee to some of the provisions of the bill. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] says that we propose in this bill to deal with the local subdivisions of the States. We do not propose to do anything of the sort. There is not a line in the bill that justifies this comment.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly. I wish to get at the facts.

Mr. BORLAND. What is meant by the language—

And the civil subdivisions thereof—

That I have moved to strike out?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will try to show the gentleman. It is the purpose of this bill to affect with its benefits these local subdivisions. It is further intended to enable these subdivisions in the ultimate to get in touch with the National Government; but this will be done by the means provided by the bill, namely through the States. They must speak through the appropriate department of the State. Under this bill no local subdivision may secure the ear of the department at Washington by direct approach.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman says we do not understand his bill. I want to call his attention to page 7, lines 1 to 5, in which it says:

That such payments shall be made, to such officers of the respective States as the governors thereof shall designate as being entitled to receive the same, by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That carries out what I said a moment ago. These subdivisions are intended to be reached by the benefits of this bill, and it is intended that these subdivisions may reach the Treasury, but they must do so through the prescribed channel, that is through the State. In other words, the unit with which the Government will deal will be the State.

I want the House to realize that this is a carefully worked out scheme of legislation. Speaking for every member of that committee, we desire to repel these continued suggestions that this bill is ill considered, or that it is in anywise a pork-barrel proposition.

Under section 3 a local subdivision of a State desiring to secure aid for the improvement of some road in that locality would apply in the first instance to the road department of that State. The road department would then take up the proposition with the Secretary of Agriculture, and in conference with a representative of his department, the merits of the proposition submitted would be discussed and settled.

If the conclusion of the conference was favorable to undertaking the project, the Department of Agriculture and the representative of the State would determine the material, character, and manner of the work of construction, or maintenance.

Thereafter the work would be conducted under such supervision as had been agreed upon by the Secretary, and the officer of the State. When the work is completed, and has been approved by the Department of Agriculture, payment will be made to the appropriate officer of the State designated by law to receive the same. Is there any man who will say that this is not an appropriate, common sense, and businesslike way in which to conduct this transaction?

If there are any further questions to be asked along the line of this local subdivision proposition, I would be very glad to have them asked in this connection.

I desire to call attention to another matter while I am on my feet. The bills which have heretofore been opprobriously described as "pork-barrel" propositions, are bills with respect to public improvements, every dollar of which is paid out of the Public Treasury. For instance, under the rivers and harbors bill, all the money is afforded and expended by the Federal Government. Under this bill not more than one-half is afforded by the Government.

Mr. BORLAND. I wanted to ask the gentleman a question on that local-subdivision proposition, but my attention was diverted at the moment. The gentleman said he wanted to know where there was anything in this bill about the Government dealing with local subdivisions. The first section says:

May aid the States and the civil subdivisions thereof.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have covered that ground.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me ask my question. I assume that language was put in there for some purpose, and that the word "State" would not be sufficient. Is it not true that a great many States do not have the power to construct and maintain rural district roads?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I admit that.

Mr. BORLAND. And that you can only aid the States in case they have the power, and if they have not the power, you must aid the authority that has the power?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Any State that can not approach the Treasury in the manner prescribed by this bill will be unable to secure the benefits of the same.

Mr. Chairman, I ask to be allowed to proceed for five minutes longer, and will address myself entirely to the merits of this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANGLEY. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. LANGLEY. Does the gentleman think it would be unwise to make any provision to meet the situation in a State like California, for instance, where they regard the amount involved so small, as the gentleman from that State [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND] intimated, that they do not care to bother with it?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. Suppose some county in a State should want its pro rata share of the funds in case the State does not act, or has not the power, do you not think it might be well to have some provision for that sort of situation?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No, because our policy is to deal with the States. Let me say that we will have no trouble on the line indicated, for the reason that the States will be so greatly interested, that every State will afford the appropriate machinery necessary to enable it to come within the benefits of this bill.

Mr. LANGLEY. I hope so. There will be no question about Kentucky, I think, but I wish there were no doubt about the relief being afforded any county that does its part, if the State as a whole does not.

Mr. BARKLEY. There are a great number of States in the Union which do not appropriate money and which can not appropriate money out of the State treasury for the purpose of constructing roads unless they pass constitutional amendments.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. In such States as that, where, by reason of limitations in the law, the State can not draw its share, is there anything in this bill to permit any subdivision or any county to apply for its portion of what the State would get if it could?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes. I am glad my friend asked me that question, because it develops a feature of the bill that has been carefully worked out. If there are any States in the Union which are unable to appropriate, out of their State treasuries, the amounts required to enable them to secure the quota going to those States, they will not be at all hindered by reason of that fact from participating in the benefits of this measure.

Mr. BARKLEY. But if that is so——

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will answer the gentleman's question. This bill does not provide that the corresponding amount to be put up against the amount coming from the Government, shall be put up by the State. You will find that the bill provides that the amount shall be afforded, and if in any State it is afforded by private, or county subscription, or in any way, just so the necessary amount is provided to match the amount afforded by the Federal Government, then that State will come within the benefits of this bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the amount is afforded by the State and by private subscription; but it says nothing about the great amount of money levied by the counties for road purposes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The language used is "otherwise than by the United States," that is to say provided the amount afforded by the Federal Government, is matched with an equal amount, however raised, the Federal fund becomes available. This language was used with design, and was intended to meet the situation in those States that do not appropriate directly to roads. Money raised by local subdivisions, or private subscription will be as effective to secure Federal aid, to the extent of the State's quota, as money directly appropriated by a State.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The gentleman says the Federal Government could only treat with the governor of the State. Section 2 provides that on or before a certain day the governor shall give notice of how much they want to have done under sections 3 and 4. In the event of failure of the governor to give notice, the Secretary of Agriculture shall take hold of the matter himself. That means that he may reach right down into the State and deal with the local authorities of the State.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That refers to the election whether a State will operate under section 3 or under section 4. The governor is given the power to make the election, in the absence of any law to the contrary.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. If the governor took no action, does not that authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to deal directly with the local authorities?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It seems to me that it is contrary to what the gentleman has stated, and that the Federal Government can deal directly with the local authorities.

Mr. SAUNDERS. If the governor does not make the election, the Department of Agriculture can make the election; that is, determine said matter. But when the department deals with the State, whether under section 3 or 4, it will do so in conformity with the terms prescribed by this law.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me say to the gentleman that section 3 makes it clear that the State is to deal with the local authorities. It says:

That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cooperate with the officers of the several States, having lawful authority in that behalf, in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads.

Lawful authority in what behalf? Where is the power in the State of Missouri for the construction of post roads? In the county court. Where is it in the gentleman's State for the construction and maintenance of post roads?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 1, add the following: "And provided further, That the term 'rural post roads' as contained in this act shall be held to mean any public road outside of an incorporated city over which the United States regularly carries rural mail, either by free rural delivery or star-route carriers."

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have not consulted with all the other members of the committee, but, as far as I am concerned, I do not think there is any objection to that amendment. I think it makes a little more certain the intent of the bill.

Mr. GOOD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. GOOD. Would not that include all the roads in portions of the country where it has a thick population, like incorporated villages and towns, even roads improved by pavement in such villages and towns? If that is the case, why should we limit it to roads in villages of the country? If rural post roads are to mean roads in incorporated villages that are paved, why not extend it to roads in the limits of any city that are paved over which the mail is carried?

Mr. TREADWAY. I should think that would be within the judgment of the highway department of the State and the Secretary of Agriculture, in whose hands the distribution of this money is to be left. It is the intent of this bill to improve rural routes and roads. Of course the gentleman's point is probably correct that a rural carrier has to go from some central post office, and probably he does pass over paved roads for a certain distance. At the same time these routes are not the kind of routes that it is intended should be benefited by this bill.

Mr. GOOD. If the amendment is adopted, a rural post route may mean a route within an incorporated village or town.

Mr. TREADWAY. Incorporated village, but not an incorporated city.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. HAYDEN. Does the gentleman intend to confine the appropriations in this bill to that kind of road only, or is that merely the basis?

Mr. TREADWAY. It is to define what is meant in this bill by rural post roads. As I understand it, the statute defines a post road, but in no place does it define the rural post roads.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Very well.

Mr. MANN. Does the term "rural post roads" occur in the bill anywhere except in section 1?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It does—three times.

Mr. MANN. Why not limit this to a definition of the words "rural post roads" as they occur in the first section? In section 1 the purpose is to fix the basis of apportionment of the money. Now, it may be proper in other cases.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I think I can explain why it is proper. The purpose of the bill is to encourage the building of additional roads to be used as rural post roads. The purpose of the apportionment is to apportion it upon the basis as it now exists, but from time to time we hope to convert into rural post roads some that are not now in that condition.

Mr. MANN. But you could not do it under this definition.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Oh, yes.

Mr. MANN. Not until you had already converted them. If you make this definition apply to section 1, that is the basis of apportionment, but if you make the definition apply to section 3, then you can not use any money on rural post roads over which you are not then carrying the mail.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It is dubious; but when we come to section 3 it is easy to make it read as it does in section 4.

Mr. MANN. It would be easy to say, instead of "in this act," "in this section." Perhaps that would not cover it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That would not cover the others.

Mr. MANN. That would cover the apportionment.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Yes. I will show the gentleman how I think this should be done.

Mr. MANN. Before the gentleman interrupts me, let me call his attention to one other thing, and the gentleman can explain that. As I understand, under the provisions of this term, it is not intended to contribute toward the support or construction of roads within either cities or villages. Am I correct or not?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The gentleman's amendment would allow it to be done in villages, and I will say that the reason for that is on account of the peculiarities that exist in New England, where 6 or 8 or 10 miles square are incorporated as a village but the populous part of it is not a separate incorporation. It is like a township in the gentleman's State.

Mr. MANN. I do not know that any such case exists now. Up to some years ago, when Chicago was enlarged by annexation, I lived in a village, incorporated, with a population of 75,000 to 100,000. It was 12 miles long and in some places 6 miles wide, and probably had a great many more roads than exist in the District of Columbia. I doubt whether anybody would want the Government of the United States to construct a road there, although when I lived there we would have been very glad to have the Government give us that aid. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, all I wanted to say was that in section 3, in line 16, just before the words "rural post roads," there be inserted the following: "roads adapted to be used as."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is in order without that motion.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I understand this amendment just embraces cities and makes no mention of towns and villages.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It excludes cities.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask why we should exclude cities and in the exclusion not include towns and villages?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will explain that to the gentleman. This is a place where we have to write a law rigidly, and it pinches in some places, but in all the New England States the little villages are not incorporated. They incorporate the town, or what we call the township, and if we used the word "town" it would exclude the township, and therefore exclude everything within the domain of the State. Some of them they call towns and some villages, but the incorporation corresponds to a township in the gentleman's State or in mine; and in using general terms we limited it for the sake of uniformity to cities. It amounts to very little, because these small villages have not taken care of their roads overly well, and it is a rural road from the post office to the line, anyway. It is negligible.

Mr. HARRISON. Do I understand that in the bill all cities were included?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. There was some doubt as to whether it did not allow us to pay for streets. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts was to make that clear. It was not intended to apply to streets, and the purpose of the amendment is to make it clear that we do not intend to contribute to the upkeep of city streets.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, on that I demand a division.

Mr. PROUTY. I do not know whether it is in order, but I desire to offer an amendment to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not offer that at this time.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, then, to strike out the word "act" in the amendment and to insert in lieu thereof the word "section."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to perfect the amendment by striking out the word "act" and inserting the word "section." Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to the fact that rural post roads are described in section 3.

Mr. PROUTY. I am fully conscious of that fact, and that is the reason I am trying to save the situation. I do not think we ought to give a definition that would apply to the entire act, but to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. Certainly.

Mr. TEMPLE. Would the gentleman's proposal be affected at all by the fact that in section 4, on page 4, line 10, we find that the appropriations are not made for rural post roads but are made for roads which are adapted to be used as rural post roads? So that however we define rural post roads it does not affect the appropriations, because the appropriations are to be made for roads which are adapted to be used by the United States as rural post roads.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, on which a division has been asked.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BORLAND. Was not unanimous consent just given to amend the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It was to perfect it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman asked unanimous consent to be permitted to offer an amendment.

Mr. LANGLEY. But the amendment has not yet been offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, as perfected by the unanimous-consent suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman from Iowa asked unanimous consent to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. No; he asked and obtained unanimous consent to perfect the language of the amendment, and the committee is voting on the amendment now. A division has been demanded by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 1.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, before I forget it, I wish to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. J. M. C. SMITH] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the substitute and pending amendment be closed in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will wait a moment until the Chair states the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. J. M. C. SMITH]. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I am in entire accord with the purport of the bill of the gentleman from Missouri for Federal aid in the construction and maintenance of our public highways.

The bill proposes to appropriate the sum of $25,000,000 for this purpose, and I notice by the report of the committee that Michigan will be entitled to the neat sum of $923,750.

There are in Michigan 51,185 miles of post roads and 1,721 miles of star routes, making a total of 52,906 miles. This would make an average allowance of $17.80 a mile for all such highways in the State. Allowing $3,000 for the construction of a gravel or macadam road, the total appropriation for Michigan would construct 307 miles of highways.

By the provisions of the bill the State is to expend a similar amount before being entitled to its benefits, so that under the present appropriation of $923,750 from the Federal Government, a like amount must be added by the State, making a total of $1,847,500, which amount applied to the construction of good roads at $3,000 per mile would construct 614 miles. This would construct two highways running north and south, or three highways east and west across our entire State.

The report of the honorable chairman states that it will require seven years for some of the States to put themselves in a position to annually expend this sum, which calls for immediate attention.

I take from the report of the committee the number and aggregate length of rural and star routes in Michigan in operation December 1, 1913:

Rural and star routes in Michigan.

Rural Delivery Service:
Number of routes		2,049
Aggregate length	miles	50,183
Average length of routes	do	24.49
Star Service:
Number of routes		167
Aggregate length	miles	1,721.2
Average length of routes	do	10.37

Table 3 shows the amount of Federal aid for each State under the provisions of the bill, and for Michigan is:

Michigan, with 3.08 per cent of total population, receives	$385,000
Michigan, with 4.31 per cent of total star and rural routes, receives	538,750
Total	923,750

It may be of interest to note the total miles of such improved highways in the United States, as shown by the report, and the classification of the same according to the material and manner of construction:

	Miles.
Class A. All water-bound macadam roads or roads with a more expensive or more durable surface	52,585
Class B. All roads built of gravel, shell, or proper combination of sand and clay	161,790
Class C. All improved earth roads with adequate side drains, compacted, with crowned surface, smooth and well maintained	222,513

The bill, it will be observed, provides for the manner of expending this Federal aid.

The first is: That the Secretary of Agriculture shall cooperate with the proper officer of each State having lawful authority in that behalf, and jointly with him consider and determine the roads in the State which may be constructed and maintained during the next fiscal year, and the material and character of construction of such maintenance, and the work shall be done under such supervision as may be agreed upon.

Under this provision, section 3 of the bill, I understand that the Secretary of Agriculture and the highway commissioner of any State may agree or determine upon the construction of any highway or highways in a State, and the entire allotment or appropriation made for any State can be expended upon the half-and-half plan, the Government paying one-half and the State one-half of the construction of the highway so determined upon, but in no case shall the United States bear more than one-half of the cost of construction and maintenance, and that construction and maintenance shall not be entered upon until a portion of the costs which are to be provided by the State has been made available.

The second provision is that contained in section 4 of the act; and by it the highways are divided into classes known as class A, class B, and class C, respectively.

CLASS A.

Shall embrace roads with a road track composed of macadam, or other material of equal utility, with a smooth, firm surface, for which the United States shall pay on account $60 per mile.

CLASS B.

Shall embrace roads well drained and with a road track composed of shell, gravel, or combination of sand and clay, or material of equal utility, with a smooth, firm surface, for which shall be paid on account by the United States the sum of $30 per mile.

CLASS C.

Shall embrace roads with drainage and side ditches, so constructed as to quickly shed water into the side ditches, kept crowned and compact, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles, for which shall be apportioned the sum of $15 per mile by the Government.

And that nothing shall be paid by the United States for any road which does not come clearly within the requirements of these classes.

The payments shall be made to such officers of the State as the governor shall designate, upon warrants drawn upon the Treasury of the United States by the Secretary of Agriculture, and nothing shall be paid by the United States on account of any road upon which there has been a default in the expenditures required by the terms of the act, and that all needful rules for the administration of the law shall be made by the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States.

The appropriation itself bears with it the evidence of fairness, and includes all the States of the Republic. One-half of the appropriation which each State is entitled to is based upon the proportion which the population of each State bears to the population of all the States and the other half of the appropriation to each State is based upon the number of miles of post routes in use which each State bears to the total number of miles of post routes of all the States.

The act further provides:

That the governor of each State shall notify the Secretary of Agriculture before the 1st day of January of each year, and within 45 days after the passage of the act during the present year, whether or not his State will conform to the terms and requirements of this law, and the character of the highway to be constructed. A copy of sections 3 and 4 of the act is hereto appended.

Mr. Chairman, I think it will be a great mistake if any State fails to avail itself of the benefits of this appropriation.

The present constitution of the State of Michigan prohibits that State from contracting an indebtedness of more than $250,000, and does not provide for the issuance of bonds for internal improvements, but there is to be submitted at the next general election the question of bond issue as provided by the last session of the legislature by amending our constitution so as to provide that—

The State may also issue bonds for the purpose of raising money for the construction and permanent improvement of the public wagon roads of the State.

This is a new provision in our constitution looking specifically to the betterment of our public highways, and is an amendment to section 10, article 10, and I have no doubt that this amendment to our constitution will receive the unanimous vote of the public-spirited citizens of Michigan, or be carried by an overwhelming majority when voted upon.

The appropriation of $25,000,000, to be divided among all the States of the Union, is not a large one, compared with other appropriations.

Much is said about appropriations for other causes, but I am fully convinced and satisfied that there can be no appropriation that will serve a better purpose than this appropriation of $25,000,000 for the purpose intended.

There seems to be a general idea that this appropriation is for the sole benefit of the farmers. I do not look at it in that light, but am persuaded that the money is to be used for the general welfare of all the people and the betterment of the Republic. Highways belong to the public and are for the use and benefit of all the people.

One gentleman states that it will double the value of the farms. I can not go to such an extreme, but I concede the fact that a farm lying alongside of a beautiful, well-kept macadam or paved highway is worth more than one not contiguous to such a road.

The great Lincoln national highway, extending from coast to coast, already in process of construction, will be permanently built. It will not only beautify the country and be of great utility to the farmer, but it will also add to the rural population by its symmetry of construction, its ease of transportation, and aid in the comfort of rural life.

I hope no farmer or person who is interested in country life will fail to see the great advantage of this appropriation, and in the States where the State law does not now permit them to avail themselves of the benefits of this act that at once the machinery will be set in motion by the legislature for coming within its provisions.

In the construction of a macadam highway a fair average cost is any place from $3,000 to $6,000, according to cost of material and the contour of the surface, and while $923,750, which is the appropriation for Michigan, may look large in gross, under section 4 of the act there can not be appropriated out of this sum but $60 for each mile of highway constructed out of macadam or similar material, and there can only be appropriated $30 for a sand and gravel and clay highway, and $15 for a highway suitable for reasonable passage of wheeled vehicles.

Under section 4 of the act, if the entire sum of $923,750 were used in the construction of macadam highways, it would require the completion of 15,295 miles, or practically one-third of the entire highways of our State. If the entire amount allotted to our State were used in the construction of gravel and clay highways, and for which the Government allows $30 for each mile under class B, there must be 30,790 miles constructed to consume the appropriation, or practically 60 per cent of the highways mentioned. While to absorb the total appropriation under this bill allotted to Michigan of $923,750 in the construction of dirt roads for convenient travel by wheeled vehicles, at $15 per mile, would require the completion of 61,580 miles and 18 per cent, or 10,000 miles more than the post and star routes mentioned in the report.

Now, the policy of expending $3,000 to $6,000 per mile for good roads in order to secure a Government benefit of $15 or $30 or $60 per mile may admit of some business tact. Sixty dollars is but 10 per cent of the cost of constructing a highway costing $6,000 a mile; $30 is but 10 per cent of a highway, constructed under class B, costing $3,000 a mile, and I set aside the business policy of whether this small appropriation limited to the construction of a mile of highway at a great expense to the State and rural community invites too large an undertaking or the construction of too many miles of such highways. But let us construct the highways and the $60, $30, and $15 will be a substantial sum for their maintenance and upkeep when once completed.

GOOD ROADS.

But about the utility, the desirability, and the benefit of the improvement of our public highways there can be no question.

Indiana and Ohio are first among the States in the construction of good roads, with approximately 25,000 miles each to their credit.

The value of improved highways to the farmer is shown in the fact that a farm is not as saleable or of a like market value situated off and away from a macadamized highway as one situated thereon, although the farms may be of equal fertility and improvements. It is also stated that farmers who are residing in those States where good roads are prevalent are eager for them; that they readily bond their townships therefor and pay their taxes willingly and readily, the important question with them being whether or not they can secure a macadam or other turnpike adjoining their premises.

The Sixty-second Congress appropriated the sum of $500,000 for the experimental construction of good highways. If any of the States received any part of this appropriation they have been more fortunate than the State of Michigan, as no part of this appropriation has crossed the State line into that territory.

The State of Michigan appropriated for the use of the State highway department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, $250,000, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, a like sum of $250,000, of which $10,000 is set aside for the running expenses of the department and the balance constitutes the State reward fund, any unexpended amount being carried over into the fund for the succeeding fiscal year. Under this law the State of Michigan contributes for every mile of well-graded road not less than 20 feet wide, with a wagon track of not less than 9 feet of sand and clay, $250; for every mile of well-graded road consisting of not less than 8 inches of compact gravel, $500 per mile; for every mile of such road constructed of crushed stone, slag, or other material, not less than 4 inches thick, the sum of $750; and for every mile of well-compacted macadam road not less than 6 inches deep crowned with stone screenings, asphalt, bituminous, or other cement, the sum of $1,000. All highway taxes are paid in cash and disbursed in townships by the township highway commissioner and township board, and in the counties by the county road commissioners, under the direction of the board of supervisors.

The ancient nations of Egypt, Tyre, Carthage, China, and Greece were extensive road builders. They knew the importance of the highways. The roads constructed by them were substantial and enduring.

It is recorded that prior to the advent of the Christian era the Chinese began the construction of long, wide, durable roadways, paved with large hewn blocks of stone, perfectly fitted and well cemented, which furnished an excellent flat surface. Many of these roads are still used. Athens was connected with her harbor, Piraeus, by a highway 200 yards wide, scarcely equaled anywhere. Highways of more than 50,000 miles solidly constructed radiated from Rome in all directions out into the Provinces. In the construction of these roads the Romans laid out low grades, straight lines, built bridges, and cut tunnels to overcome natural obstacles. The foundation was always firm, composed of small stones or fragments of brick, well beaten down, upon which a pavement of large stone was next laid, set firmly in cement, upon which system we have not yet improved in highway construction. Immense sums were expended in the construction and upkeep of these roads, exceeding any other public outlay, and after 2,000 years of continual use many of these roads are in almost perfect condition; and it is worthy of note that with the destruction of its highways by the barbarians the Empire of Rome began to decline.

This mention of ancient highways is made for the purpose of showing that good highways and high civilization are closely allied. At the present day Italy constructs and takes good care of its highways as a well-preserved ancient custom.

The effect of good highways will be to enhance the culture of the people or to uplift the rural districts more than any other improvement that could be undertaken, and I find four counties in my own district will construct a total of 99 miles at a cost exceeding a quarter of a million dollars. The counties, according to information furnished to me by the clerk of each county, will construct and expend the following amounts for good roads during the present year of 1914:

Calhoun County, 29 miles; State reward, $29,300; county funds, $73,800.

Branch County, 21 miles; estimated cost, $58,616.66; and finish work of preceding year.

Kalamazoo County, 25 miles, at an expense of $75,000.

Eaton County, 24 miles, expending $45,000.

Hillsdale County, records showing no action taken as yet.

In the construction of these highways, although the State aid comes from all the property of the State, still this is but a part. The land contiguous to the highways and the community and township also bear their just proportion, and, as in other cases of development, the farmer stands in the front rank. The needs and the demands are imperative, and the benefits are clearly evident. Every argument must be in favor of good roads and better highways. As time goes on, the necessity of good roads will become more and more apparent. Vast sums of money are expended for the development of our waterways. There can be no greater utility and benefit to the farmer or agriculturist than the highways; they should be well constructed with a view to endurance and permanency. Millions upon millions have been paid out for other internal improvements; canals have been built, rivers improved, public buildings have been erected without stint or number by Federal aid. Since and including the year 1908 there has been appropriated for improvement of rivers and harbors, one of our great commercial highways, but of no more importance than our public highways, the aggregate of over $261,000,000. Alone, thus far, the farmers have practically builded the highways which have opened up rural districts, and they have enriched the country with schoolhouses and churches. Farmers are the basis of our national fabric, and for the purpose for which this appropriation is made will enter into the use of it with a spirit and fervor that has always characterized them. The great public need of better highways is now dawning, and almost within the reach of the husbandmen. It will receive their hearty support and with them be shared in by all the people of our country.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cooperate with the officers of the several States, having lawful authority in that behalf, in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads. That between the 1st day of February and the 30th day of June in each fiscal year the Secretary of Agriculture and the officer, or officers, of each State having lawful power to act for the State, may jointly consider and determine the roads in such State which, under the provisions of this section, may be constructed and maintained during the next fiscal year and the material, character, and manner of such construction and maintenance; that such construction and maintenance shall be conducted under such supervision as shall have been previously agreed upon by the Secretary of Agriculture and said officer, or officers, of said State; that in no case shall the United States bear more than one-half of the cost of the construction and maintenance of any road under the provisions of this section; that the Secretary of Agriculture shall not commence such joint construction of any road in any State until the portion of the cost thereof which is to be provided otherwise than by the United States has been made available.

SEC. 4. That certain roads in the States which are adapted to use by the United States as rural post roads shall be divided into three classes to be known as class A, class B, and class C.

Class A shall embrace roads upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track composed of macadam or other material of equal utility and cost, constructed and maintained in such manner that it shall have a smooth, firm surface.

Class B shall embrace roads upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track composed of shells, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay or other material of equal utility but less expensive than macadam, constructed and maintained in such manner that it shall have a smooth firm surface.

Class C shall embrace roads upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with adequate drainage and ample side ditches, with a roadway constructed so as to quickly shed water into the side ditches and kept crowned and compacted by dragging or other adequate means so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles.

That on or before the 1st day of March in each fiscal year the governor of any State may file in the office of the Secretary of Agriculture a statement setting forth the location and the number of miles of roads in such State which he claims to be in each of classes A, B, and C, respectively; and if such State have a State highway department, then his said statement may be accompanied by a report from such State highway department showing the total number of miles of roads in such State in each of classes A, B, and C, the location of such roads, a description in detail of their physical features, the material, manner, and, as far as may be, the cost of their construction and the manner and cost of their maintenance.

That the Secretary of Agriculture shall consider such statements and determine which of the roads mentioned therein are in class A, which in class B, and which in class C, and make a report of his said determinations to the respective governors, filing such statements, on or before the 20th day of the following June.

That no charge shall be made for so considering and determining such statement of any governor if the same shall be accompanied by a report from the State highway department of such State as hereinbefore provided; but in all other cases there shall be deducted 10 per cent of the amount which shall be payable on account of the roads in such State under the provisions of this act.

That at the end of each fiscal year the United States shall pay on account of the roads so determined to be in classes A, B, and C, as follows: On each mile in class A the sum of $60, on each mile in class B the sum of $30, and on each mile in class C the sum of $15: Provided, That if in any State the aggregate of said sums would exceed the amount which for that fiscal year has been apportioned to such State under this act to be expended under the provisions of this section, then said sums per mile shall be reduced pro rata so that their aggregate shall not exceed said amount.

That nothing whatever shall be paid by the United States under the provisions of this section for any road which does not clearly come within the requirements of class A, B, or C, as hereinbefore defined.

That such payments shall be made to such officers of the respective States as the governors thereof shall designate as being entitled to receive the same, by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Secretary of Agriculture.

That such payments of money made by the United States as hereinbefore provided shall, during the ensuing year, be applied to the construction, maintenance, or extension of the respective roads for which paid and that in addition thereto the State or civil subdivisions thereof shall, during said ensuing fiscal year, expend in the construction, maintenance, or extension of said roads an amount equal to the amount so paid by the United States; that if such sums are not so expended upon the construction, maintenance, or extension of said roads, respectively, during the ensuing fiscal year, then at the end of such fiscal year nothing whatever shall be paid by the United States on account of any road upon which there has been a default in such expenditure; that the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine whether such expenditures have been so made, and to aid him in such determinations that the proper officers of the State shall make such showing as he shall require.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have about three minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SMITH] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I shall cheerfully support the bill now before the House in aid of good roads. I shall do so not only because of the general benefit it will be to all classes throughout the country, but because of its special benefit to a long-neglected class of our people—the farmers.

It has only been within recent years that the National Government has taken any note of this worthy class of our people; and even up to this time they have not received the degree of care and attention that, it seems to me, it was the duty of the Government to bestow upon them.

However, I am glad to say that the tide is now at last turning in favor of the people who live upon the farm. Just a few years ago we gave them rural free delivery. Later we gave them the parcel post. Now we propose a plan for the improvement of the roads, in order to give them more complete enjoyment of the free delivery and parcel-post service.

Good roads are worth many times what they cost. They bring producer and consumer closer together; they open new markets to both the merchant and the farmer; they economize transportation; they enlarge the farmer's opportunities; they cheapen the cost of the farmer's improvements, greatly enhance the value of his land, and add immensely to the comforts and pleasures of farm life.

The more I study the question of goods roads the more I am amazed that it has received so little attention. Bad roads have not only been the special blight of country life, but they have exacted a toll upon commerce that is incalculable. When we consider the fact that practically the entire food supply and the bulk of the raw materials of manufacture must be transported over bad country roads before they reach the consumer we can form some idea of this enormous toll and of the individual and national loss which it entails.

While the bill is not all one could wish, it is a beginning—a step in the right direction—which will establish a national policy that in the years to come will, in my judgment, result in more practical benefit to the people than anything we could possibly do. I think it best that we should start conservatively, and this we are doing. And as the benefits to be derived from the inauguration of this policy are to be local as well as national, I believe the bill is wisely drawn to require cooperation between the local and the National Government.

Mr. Chairman, we all know that perhaps the greatest clog to the progress, development, and prosperity of this country has been the steady movement from the farms to the cities. Farm life has been neither pleasant nor profitable, hence it has not been attractive. This should be changed, and it would be in large measure by the construction of good roads. Then if a financial system suitable to the peculiar needs of the farmer shall be established, as we hope it will be before this session adjourns, farm life will in due time become what it ought to be—the most independent, the most wholesome, the most prosperous, and the happiest of all the avocations. Then will the movement back to the farm begin, and with agriculture prosperous and contented peace and plenty will reign throughout the land.

[Mr. MOSS of West Virginia addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss] has just now stated it would be left to the discretion of the Government and State authority to apply a part of that fund to the construction of new roads. However, the bill provides, if I read it rightly, on page 6, lines 22 and 25:

That nothing whatever shall be paid by the United States under the provisions of this section for any road which does not clearly come within the requirements of class A, B, or C as hereinbefore defined.

Mr. SAUNDERS. You are reading from one section, and I referred the gentleman from West Virginia to another section. The section from which you are reading is a maintenance proposition. Section 3 is a section under which there may be either maintenance or construction.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. So it is possible under the bill to construct new roads?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Absolutely.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. How, then, will you secure the money from the States?

Mr. SAUNDERS. It is provided that if the money is afforded, whether by the States, or the localities, or by the localities and States in conjunction, or by private subscription,—just so the necessary amount is afforded,—that amount will be met by an equivalent amount from the Federal Government, to the extent of the State's quota.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Let me ask the gentleman if there is anything in this bill, except the provision on page 4, from line 2 to line 9, which provides for any contribution on the part of the State or county at all?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Oh, yes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I can not find it. I do not see how under this section even any State could be held to contribute one penny.

Mr. SAUNDERS. To what section are you referring?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. To section 3.

Mr. SAUNDERS. It is expressly provided under section 3, that the communities or the localities in the State must provide an amount equal to that which is afforded by the Federal Government.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. But these communities and States may claim that these roads A, B, and C——

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is in another section, which has nothing to do with section 3. If you will look at the A, B, and C sections, you will find there that the States are required to maintain those roads conformable to a prescribed standard, in order to receive Federal aid. It does not make any difference what it costs to maintain these roads up to this standard. Until that standard is reached and maintained, a State is not entitled to aid under section 4. It is a very easy calculation to make to satisfy anyone that these roads can not be kept up to the prescribed standard for as much as 12 months, without spending on them fully as much, and in 99 per cent of the cases more, than will be obtained from the Government per mile after this standard has been maintained. Hence there is no danger that the State under section 4 will not expend more than it will receive per mile from the Government.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. My contention is, Mr. Chairman—if I have a minute more time—that this section which deals with the contributions by the States is very indefinite; that is, it does not say definitely and positively that the State must contribute. It only says that in no case shall the United States bear more than one-half of the cost of construction and maintenance of any road. Under that provision the State government can insist that it has already done its part in constructing the road and in bringing it up to the condition it is in at that time, and consequently that all the money contributed by the Government is in addition to what the State has already expended on it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. May I read from this section to my friend?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I read:

In no case shall the United States pay more than one-half of the cost of construction and maintenance of any road under the provisions of this section.

If that is so, the State can not call upon the United States Government for more than one-half of any road constructed or maintained under section 3.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. For more than one-half of what is needed in addition?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No; not more than one-half of what is required for a road constructed or maintained under this section.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Then the State may expend nothing more?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No matter what may be expended, the United States Government can not be required to pay for more than one-half.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. In addition to what has been done by the State? It will not be duplicated by the State?

Mr. SAUNDERS. The language of the bill is that the United States Government shall in no case bear more than one-half of the cost of maintenance and construction of any road, and then the next sentence says, that joint construction of any road in any State shall not commence until the portion of the cost thereof which is to be provided otherwise than by the United States has been made available.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is any time left? I want to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky can proceed for two minutes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it not a fact that the A, B, C section is intended to be a maintenance section and not a construction section?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Absolutely.

Mr. BARKLEY. The previous section is the section which contemplates construction, but in that section it is provided that in no case shall the Government pay more than one-half.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Absolutely.

Mr. GOOD. If that is simply a maintenance section, then why is the language used in describing the character of the work the same as the language in section 3? It says it shall apply to the construction, maintenance, and extension.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, has the time expired?

The CHAIRMAN. One minute is left.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Where does the gentleman find the language he refers to?

Mr. GOOD. On page 7, line 8. The same language is found there as is found in paragraph 3; that is, for construction, maintenance, and extension. Certainly, the money expended for the extension of the road can not be called maintenance. The money expended for construction is not a maintenance item.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this is the same misapprehension under which he was laboring on last Saturday. That language does not refer to use on the road that has already been maintained up to type. When a road has been maintained up to standard so that the community is entitled to receive from the Federal Government the appropriate amount prescribed by this bill, then when it is proposed to expend this amount thereafter this paragraph provides that it must be applied to extension, maintenance, or construction, of some road. It can not be applied otherwise. This language refers to the future expenditure of the money already earned by the maintenance of the roads up to the prescribed standard.

Mr. GOOD. It is unfortunate language, then, to say the least.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Not in the least.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That on or before the 1st day of January in each fiscal year the governor of each State in conformity to the laws of such State, or in the absence of any law of such State on the subject, may elect whether Federal aid to the construction and maintenance of rural post roads in such State shall be given under the provisions of section 3 or section 4 of this act, or partly under both sections and the proportion under each, by filing a written statement of such election in the office of the Secretary of Agriculture: Provided, That for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1914, such election shall be made within 45 days after the final passage of this act. If the governor of any State shall refuse or fail to make such election as provided by this section, then within 10 days after the time in which said governor is authorized to make such election has elapsed the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine said matter.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 12, after the word "matter," add the following: "If in any year the governor or other officer or department of any State shall fail or refuse to comply with the terms of this act so as to entitle such State as a whole to its proportion, herein provided, then any civil subdivision of such State not smaller than a county shall have the right, through its proper officers, to make application for and receive its proportion of the amount such State would have received under this act, the amount so received by such subdivision to bear the same proportion to the amount that the State would have received as its population and rural post-road mileage bears to the population and rural post-road mileage of the whole State.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent that the debate on this section and amendments to it be closed in 20 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want five minutes.

Mr. BORLAND. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I want five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] asks unanimous consent that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want to state to the Chair and to the gentleman from Missouri that I want five minutes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I see only four gentlemen wanting time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, this is rather an important amendment, to my mind, and I may want two or three minutes more than the five.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GUDGER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I want one minute.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, 30 minutes instead of 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, the reason I offer this amendment is for the purpose of clearing up what I deem to be a great uncertainty as to the maintenance provisions of the act as reported.

As I suggested awhile ago to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], it is my understanding that there are at the present time 22 States in the Union which have no road funds with which they could build roads in the States. Many of those States can not provide, without an amendment to their State constitutions, such a road fund by reason of present constitutional limitations.

Now, the latter part of this section 2 provides that "if the governor of any State shall fail or refuse to make such election as provided by this section, then within 10 days after the time in which said governor is authorized to make such election has elapsed the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine said matter." That is, he shall bring an end to it. He has the arbitrary authority to determine whether that State shall receive any money or whether it shall not receive any money.

Now, the object of the amendment I have offered is to take care of the situation in which a State might be entitled to an appropriation because the taxation is levied by local counties, as in Kentucky and other States, where the State contributes nothing to the construction and maintenance of public roads, but where the localities and counties build their own roads and maintain them; and in such a place as that, if the governor, by reason of the State laws or other authority, should refuse or fail for any reason to comply with the terms of this act, so as to entitle the State as a whole to its proportionate share of the fund, then there ought to be given to the counties and the local subdivisions of the State the power to make application direct to the Secretary of Agriculture, so that they would not be deprived of their share of this road fund by reason of the failure or refusal of any State officer to comply with the terms of the act.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ASWELL. Does the gentleman think that a governor of one of these States would refuse to make the request for these funds?

Mr. BARKLEY. He might; but there is no provision in this bill for a State to receive any proportion of the road fund except as a whole. It must receive all of it that it is entitled to for that, and it can only receive that part to which it is entitled in the event it puts up an equal sum, either by State appropriation or private subscription, or by some other channel, which is very indefinite.

Mr. ASWELL. Could not the governor request the amount for one county?

Mr. BARKLEY. He could do it; but this bill does not provide that a county could make application to the governor.

Mr. ASWELL. It does.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not so understand it.

Mr. COX. Who has charge of the highways in the gentleman's counties?

Mr. BARKLEY. Each county elects supervisors, and they are not under any State authority except in an indefinite way. They levy taxes and control the construction of roads.

Mr. COX. As I understand, in the event that the governor neglects or refuses to do his duty as provided in this bill, the gentleman wants to give the counties the right and power to get their share of this appropriation?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is it, exactly.

Mr. COX. I think the amendment is a good amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. This last part of section 2 provides that if the governor does not comply with the law the Secretary of Agriculture has arbitrary power in the matter. In case the governor does not comply with the law and neglects to perform his duty, I want to give the counties the right to get their proportion of the money that the State would get.

Mr. COX. By complying with this act?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; and their share would be determined by population and rural mail routes in proportion to the ratio that they would bear to the whole State.

Mr. COX. I think the gentleman's amendment is a good amendment.

Mr. BARNHART. By reference to section 2 the gentleman will see—

> That on or before the 1st day of January in each fiscal year the governor of each State, in conformity to the laws of such State, or in the absence of any law of such State on the subject, may elect whether Federal aid to the construction and maintenance of rural post roads in such State shall be given under the provisions of section 3 or section 4 of this act, or partly under both sections and the proportion under each, by filing a written statement of such election in the office of the Secretary of Agriculture.

It is purely up to the governor of the State whether or not the State shall ask for this aid. He has the privilege of asking for a part of it or asking for all. It gives him the broadest and most liberal powers in the matter.

Mr. BARKLEY. I know; but suppose the governor does not do it. Suppose the State, under its law, can not appropriate one cent. Then, are the counties to be denied the right to apply to the Government for their share?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Does not the gentleman from Kentucky believe it would be a very bad precedent to say that a citizen or a civil subdivision of a State could appeal from the sovereign authority of the State to a departmental officer down here in the Federal Government to right some wrong that that State had done to a civil subdivision of the State?

Mr. BARKLEY. This is not the righting of a wrong; it is providing the means whereby every section of the country can get its share of this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for two minutes more in order to answer the gentleman's objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. If it will meet the contention of the gentleman from Missouri, I have no objection to providing that, if the governor does not make application for the State as a whole, he may make application for any one county, provided that county requests him to do it for the benefit of the county; but I do think it is unjust to the subdivisions of States, where they bear the whole brunt of road improvement and maintenance by local taxation, to deprive them of the right to share in this fund because some State officer does not do it or has not the power under the State laws to make application for the whole State.

Mr. KEATING. As a matter of fact, this bill provides for doing the very thing that the gentleman wants to do.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have been unable to find it.

Mr. KEATING. The bill provides that this shall be done in conformity to the laws of each State. Now, if, in your State, the counties control, according to this bill we would recognize those counties through the governor. It is inconceivable that the governor of a State would refuse to make this request when the proper official applied to him.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no provision in this bill whereby the governor can apply to the Department of Agriculture for any portion of the sum that would go to the State or for any amount except the whole portion that would be alloted to it.

Mr. KEATING. Oh, no.

Mr. BARKLEY. He can not make application for any sum less than the whole amount.

Mr. KEATING. Yes, he can; for any portion of it.

Mr. BARKLEY. He can not make a request for the portion that any county would be entitled to.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The policy of the committee in drawing this bill was to treat the State as a sovereign. It was not intended by it to go within the borders of a State and in any manner interfere with the sovereignty of the State. It would be a ridiculous situation if we should pass a piece of legislation here that allowed a township, which is a civil subdivision of a State, to appeal from the State authorities to a civil-service man down here in the Agricultural Department. What we intended to do was to deal with the sovereign States. When Great Britain deals with us she deals with the head of our Government, although the matter under consideration may ultimately have to go down through a Government department; and when we deal with Kentucky or Missouri we must deal with the sovereign power of that State. Furthermore, we must assume—we could not afford to do otherwise—that the State officers of Kentucky will not wrong a citizen or a municipal subdivision of that State. If he should do that, there is an appeal, not to the Secretary of Agriculture, but to the people at the ballot box in the next election.

Mr. BARKLEY. According to my idea, it is not an appeal over the head of the governor of the State, but, under this bill, the governor makes an election as to whether or not the improvement of the roads of the State, as a whole, shall be carried on under section 3 or under section 4. If he makes no election by a certain date, then the Department of Agriculture has the right to determine the matter.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That is right. The purpose was not to have each county auditing accounts between the United States Government and the townships in Kentucky. To do that would eat up the entire fund, just merely in auditing the accounts.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, no.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The Secretary of Agriculture has been very firm in requesting us to do that; and I think myself that to send down into some township that may have but 1 mile of road, to deal with that township and audit its accounts over the head of the State government, would be the doing of a ludicrous thing, and it would be so cumbersome that it could not be operated.

Mr. HOWARD. As I understand the gentleman's explanation, if the State of Missouri was entitled to $100,000, and the counties or subdivisions could raise $100,000, if they applied to the Secretary of Agriculture through the duly authorized and constituted State authorities, they could get $100,000?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That is right.

Mr. BARKLEY. If they had a like amount to expend upon the road.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That is right.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it entirely discretionary with the governor and the state department, after they get the money, where they shall use it?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It is, under section 3, but not under section 4.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then, suppose they make application through the governor and the money is sent back, is there anything to require the governor to give the county which made the application for it its share of the fund?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Nothing except his oath of office and the law he has sworn to uphold.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have not had the opportunity heretofore to say that I am heartily in favor of this bill. I have always favored Federal aid for the construction of good roads. I have heretofore had occasion to express my views on the subject on the floor of the House. I am aware that the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Virginia and other members of the committee on roads have given the subject a very careful and thorough study. I am prepared to believe that the bill presented is one of the most satisfactory that could have been presented to the House under all the circumstances. In the main, its provisions are similar to those in a bill which I introduced in this Congress and also in the last Congress. And still there are two or three amendments which I think ought to be put on the bill. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] is one of them.

I do not think it is fair or that it would be just to the counties of the various States to leave this matter altogether with the governor. It is all right, Mr. Chairman, to give to the governor and the officers of the State who are in authority the right to first say whether or not their State shall participate in the fund, but in the event that the governor and the lawful officers of the State should decline to accept or permit the State to participate it seems to me the counties and the civil subdivisions of the States in States like Kentucky and Tennessee, where the roads are built by the counties, should have a right to participate.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. ASWELL. Would the gentleman provide that in that case the Federal Government might deal directly with the counties and not through the State?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I would not be in favor of that. I would not be in favor of the Federal Government dealing directly with the county, and I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky does not propose any such thing.

Mr. ASWELL. I think it does.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It provides that in the event the governor of the State should fail to accept the money, then the Secretary of Agriculture may give to the counties in the States which are prepared to use it their proportion of the appropriation. That is exactly what this bill which you and I favor provides, but it does not do so as fully as the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. Would the gentleman favor a further division and subdivision from the county to the township and then the school district? Where would the gentleman limit it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I would limit it to the counties of the various States, as does the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky. This bill provides that if a governor fails to accept this fund the Secretary of Agriculture may determine what shall be done, and the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky simply makes it plainer and makes it the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to recognize the county.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to give you as an illustration a fact that occurred which will illustrate the necessity of such an amendment. It is not necessary for me to mention names, but a certain county wanted to participate in the fund of $500,000 which was carried in the current Post Office appropriation bill, which gave the Secretary of Agriculture and the Postmaster General the right to use the fund in building good roads in various sections of this country for demonstration purposes. I know that the governor of a State selected two counties in the extreme eastern part of the State, away from the general travel. Those counties were expected to put up $2 for $1 received from the Federal Government, and were to get $10,000 apiece. They were notified that they must come up prepared with the pro rata amount within a certain time. They failed to do it, and thereupon the governor of the State was notified that these counties had failed to comply with the necessary requirement and asked to designate other counties.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee be extended one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Notwithstanding the fact that there were other counties in other sections of the State which had been demanding and asking the privilege of participating in the fund, the governor stood pat and declined to recommend them. If this law had been in effect, the Secretary of Agriculture and the Postmaster General would not have been able to recognize the request of those counties.

Mr. BARNHART. If the governor of a State refused to do his duty, what assurance has the gentleman that the county officials or the township officers would not refuse to do their duty?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not mean to say that the governor refused to do his duty, but he refused to recognize the request of the counties.

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman has put up the proposition that the governor refused the request of the county. And what assurance has he that the officials of the township or the county would not refuse?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is hardly fair to suppose that the judge of a county court or the county highway commissioners would refuse if the people of his particular county desired Federal aid.

Mr. BARNHART. Or the governor of a State? [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is entirely a different proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky was undoubtedly offered with good intent and good purpose; but it ought not to be adopted, for two good reasons: First, because it is inconceivable that any governor of any one of the 48 States would leave one penny in the Treasury that he could get out under the appropriation. So for that reason the amendment seems wholly unnecessary. The second is that it will be so cumbersome that it will detract from the workability of the bill. In support of that I call attention to the fact that there are 7,000 counties in the United States and 29,000 townships. The amendment would force the Federal Government to enter into negotiation with 29,000 townships and 7,000 counties, which would eat up all the amount that they could get out of this. This bill is a good bill. It is not perfect, but it is a long stride in the right direction. It should not be torn to pieces by undigested amendments, however well meaning the author may be. We promised this relief and the passage of such a bill in our platform and on the stump. It is now our solemn duty to do in office what we promised to do when seeking office. We are all with the people and for interior improvements on the stump while looking for votes. What the people desire is to have some one for them in action. The good-roads committee have made the start. They are keeping the faith. It is our duty to now support them and pass this bill. Some of the membership are opposing for one cause and another; but what counts now and what will count next November is not hairsplitting and technicalities, but results. I am proud to see my party keeping the faith. I am proud of the prompt methods of the Roads Committee.

MORE INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS AND LESS TAXES ARE NEEDED.

We must spend more within and less without. Improve the conditions within and we will have no fear from without.

Internal improvements, in which the plain people have a deep and immediate interest rather than a remote one, will do more to keep us a happy, closely united, and contented people than all the subsidies paid to railroads, to mail ships and steamships, to tariff subsidies and high duties laid on the one least able to bear and for the benefit of the class least in need. I tell you, sir, the American people will not sit idly by and be ground down by inequalities and inequities for which you can give no good or adequate answer.

Four hundred millions for war and navy and not one cent for improvements of highways and post roads of the country will not satisfy them when they know, and they shall know as long as such injustice and inequality prevails.

Millions for post offices and public buildings for a few towns of the country and no assistance for the post roads and the little towns will not satisfy them, and is wrong as well.

A billion-dollar session of Congress and not one cent for post roads or internal improvements will not satisfy the producers who send abroad annually $600,000,000 in products from their toil, zeal, and industry, thereby replenishing our Treasury to the brim.

You have arranged tariff schedules for the manufacturer, so that his riches are greater than he ever anticipated. You have subsidized the railroads with land grants until they have grown corpulent with wealth. You have increased the appropriations for the war and navy until the patience of this citizenship is almost exhausted, and now, when asked to do something for the plain citizen, who produces more every year than he himself consumes, this bill will and deserves to be the most popular bill passed. It is the starting of a great improvement that will go on and on after we are gone. We shall all be proud of the beginning.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address myself to this amendment. The committee has already been attacked, it will be observed, on the ground that it had provided in the bill that the Federal Government should deal with subdivisions of a State. I think we successfully repelled that attack. Now this is a proposition to compel the Government under certain indicated conditions to deal with these subdivisions. As a matter of principle the Government should not deal with a smaller unit than a State. On the preparation of the bill we had in mind that it was not wise to go further than we have done. Hence we provided that one sovereignty should deal with another sovereignty.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I did not attack the committee on that ground.

Mr. SAUNDERS. No, the gentleman did not. I am merely showing that the committee is between two fires in this matter. I know the difficulty that my friend from Kentucky has in mind, but it is not a substantial one. The governor of the State has merely the right to choose between two working plans. He does not select localities, or communities. He merely determines whether his State shall operate under section 3, or section 4. Even this right can be taken from him by State law.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. It seems to me there is another provision here which strengthens the argument the gentleman is making, and that is the provision in line 21, page 2, that the governor of each State, in conformity to the laws of such State, may elect, and so forth.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes the gentleman is correct. I was going to call attention to that provision. This election is really not with the governor, but with the State. The election is provisionally with the governor. The ultimate power is in the State.

Mr. COOPER. Exactly.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Having in mind that the amount to which a State is entitled on a $25,000 basis, may be anywhere from $100,000, to $1,500,000, does anyone imagine, as a practical proposition, that there is any State in this Union in which election will not be made, and that State put in a position to receive the amount to which it may be entitled?

Theoretically the difficulty suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky might arise, practically such a situation will never occur.

[Mr. LANGLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, on this question of cooperation between the State and the Federal authorities it is just as well to get down to a little facts without any particular theories about it. We appropriated in the last Congress $500,000, to be expended jointly by the Postmaster General and the Secretary of Agriculture in cooperation with the States in improving rural post roads. Here is the report of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Postmaster General as to what they did with it:

The following States, California, Indiana, Kansas, Pennsylvania, and Utah, failed to give any attention or to reply to the joint communication of the Postmaster General and the Secretary of Agriculture. The following States, Delaware, Michigan, New Mexico, New York, South Dakota, and Wisconsin, refused to participate. This apparent apathy on the part of some and unwillingness on the part of other States to participate in the proposal contained in the act of Congress when the first offer of an equal allotment of $10,000 was submitted may indicate that the amount of the allotment was so small as to be unattractive, or it may indicate that the States are not eager to receive Federal aid except when unrestricted by Federal supervision, or it may have resulted from the fact that the State laws do not permit a joint action with the Federal Government in the matter, and that the amount offered was too small to make legislative action worth while.

The following States, Arkansas, Connecticut, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hempshire, New Jersey, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Rhode Island, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, West Virginia, and Wyoming, were unable to participate because of their inability to raise the necessary fund subject to the control of Federal authority, or because, for various reasons, they failed to meet the requirements by April 21, 1913, the date fixed by the joint agreement. These results indicate, beyond reasonable doubt, the present inability of the States generally throughout the Union to act in the matter of Federal aid in their capacity of States. Only three States have so acted (Maine, Connecticut, and Vermont), and in each case it has been only after special legislation that action could be had. One State, Ohio, expects to act jointly with certain counties; and three States, Minnesota, Maryland, and Iowa, will have certain supervisory authority over the work to be done, because the State laws so require. The Government in these cases will act in conjunction with the State highway authorities in supervising the work of improvement. All action effected by the States mentioned in this paragraph was, under the second plan for distribution, devised after the obvious failure of the first plan.

The following States, Georgia and South Carolina, were unable to participate because of the limitations of the Federal statutes which provide for an eight-hour day for all laborers and mechanics on Government work and the Executive order stipulating the nonemployment of convict labor on Government work. The effect of the eight-hour law and the Executive order barring convict labor is considered at greater length at another point in this report.

The following States, Arizona, Colorado, and Washington, were unable to designate a highway on which rural mail service is or may hereafter be established.

The following States, Alabama, Iowa, and Oregon, were the only ones to accept the allotment as originally proposed by the Postmaster General and the Secretary of Agriculture, and the work of improvement in these States is now under way or provided for.

So, out of 48 States only 3 States—Iowa, Alabama, and Oregon—were able to participate in the division.

Mr. HAMMOND. What is the date of that report?

Mr. BORLAND. The date is August 26, 1913. It is House Document 204, Sixty-third Congress, first session.

Mr. HAMMOND. I think there is a gross mistake made in the statement, if it is supposed to relate to the present time. I think Minnesota has received a large amount of the money. I think that money is being expended there, and that it has been held that the eight-hour law does not apply to the construction of roads in that State, and the work is now going on, and the money has been made available, and because of the failure of certain States to take out the money they might have received, Minnesota received more.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman will see that by his statement he may be right, and the statement here may be right that—

Three States—Minnesota, Maryland, and Iowa—will have certain supervisory authority over the work to be done, because the State laws so require.

So they are evidently adjusting themselves to the condition.

Mr. HAMMOND. I notice from what you read before that certain States would not participate, because they have no means of raising the available sums, and Minnesota was included.

Mr. FRANCIS. Before that report was made, $120,000 of it went to Ohio, because that was fixed.

Mr. BORLAND. One State, Ohio, expects to act jointly with certain counties. One hundred and twenty thousand dollars was evidently raised by the counties.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does not the gentleman think that in case this provision had included the counties the whole amount would have been exhausted?

Mr. GUDGER. I am heartily in favor of this bill, and I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 8, noes 53.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, for the purpose of asking the chairman a question.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. You can not do it in that way, but I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have one minute.

Mr. GOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman what the last two words in this section, namely, "said matter," refer to. If I read the sentence correctly, it provides if the governor of the State shall refuse to make an election, then within 10 days the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine said matter.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It means said matter of whether this act will be administered in that State under section 3 or section 4 or partly under section 3 and partly under section 4.

Mr. GOOD. I would ask the gentleman if that might not cause considerable annoyance and misconstruction?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will say to the gentleman that I think he is unduly alarmed.

Mr. GOOD. Will you accept an amendment to strike out the words "said matter" and insert "the place upon which Federal aid for the construction and maintenance of rural post roads in any such States shall be given"?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That would mix the whole thing up.

Mr. GOOD. The Secretary of Agriculture determines the plan provided for in section 3 or the plan provided for in section 4 or a combination of the two plans; but when he says that the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine said matter, said matter refers in that sentence only to the election.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Would this satisfy the gentleman, that the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine the matter for said election?

Mr. GOOD. I think that inquiry raises the question I have raised, and it will be raised in the mind of the officer who administers this law. It is not the question of election the Secretary must determine, if I get the meaning of the chairman correctly. The question to be settled is what plan may be adopted—that is, the plan provided in section 3 or the plan of section 4 or a combination of the two plans.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I think it is all perfectly plain in these words.

Mr. HOWARD. That is only in the case where he fails to make an election at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cooperate with the officers of the several States, having lawful authority in that behalf, in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads. That between the 1st day of February and the 30th day of June in each fiscal year the Secretary of Agriculture and the officer, or officers, of each State having lawful power to act for the State, may jointly consider and determine the roads in such State which, under the provisions of this section, may be constructed and maintained during the next fiscal year and the material, character, and manner of such construction and maintenance; that such construction and maintenance shall be conducted under such supervision as shall have been previously agreed upon by the Secretary of Agriculture and said officer, or officers, of said State; that in no case shall the United States bear more than one-half of the cost of the construction and maintenance of any road under the provisions of this section; that the Secretary of Agriculture shall not commence such joint construction of any road in any State until the portion of the cost thereof which is to be provided otherwise than by the United States has been made available.

Mr. MONDELL, Mr. SHACKLEFORD, and Mr. BORLAND rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] is recognized.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I have just received word from some of the gentlemen interested in the calendar that they would like to take up an appropriation bill. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] is anxious to take up the Indian appropriation bill, and I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section close in 10 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. To dispose of $28,000,000 in this way will require a vote. It can not be expedited in that manner. It will require a quorum. I object.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I move, then, that debate close in 20 minutes on this section.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the motion is not in order, no debate having taken place.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment at the end of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 3, on page 4, line 9, insert the following:
"Provided, That States having within their borders public lands, reserved or unreserved or untaxed, shall only be required to pay such proportion of one-half of the cost of construction as the lands in private ownership in such States, and taxable, bear to the total area of the State, and the remainder shall be paid by the United States."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the bill provides that the States shall pay one-half of all the expenditures. That is a very wise and proper provision, in my judgment. But there are many States in which there are large areas of public lands untaxed, lands which do not contribute to the building of roads or the maintenance of governmental institutions.

My amendment provides that in such cases that half which the States shall be obliged to pay shall in public-land States be paid only in such proportion by those States as the lands in private ownership bear to the entire area of the States.

The State which I have the honor to represent on this floor has only about 20 per cent of its area in private ownership. About 80 per cent of the lands are public lands, reserved and unreserved, and they do not contribute in any way by taxes or otherwise in the building of roads. It seemed to me that the United States as a proprietor should bear such proportion of that half of the cost as its ownership of lands bears to the entire area of the State.

Mr. FRANCIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FRANCIS. Is it not a fact that there are few States of the Union which have not public lands?

Mr. MONDELL. There are some States, I think about 20 in all, where the area of public lands ranges all the way from one-half of 1 per cent, as in the case of Missouri, up to about 85 per cent, as in the case of Nevada.

Mr. FRANCIS. There are still some public lands in the State of Ohio, and some in Kentucky, and, in fact, in almost every State of the Union.

Mr. MONDELL. There are some public lands in some of the States east of the Mississippi River, as well as in States having a large amount of public lands west of the Mississippi River.

This plan would be equitable, because it would apply to every State that has public lands. It would obligate the Government to pay a fair share of the cost of construction of these roads. The Federal Government should contribute one-half, and then such proportion of the other half as its proprietorship of public land obligates it to pay under this amendment.

The States of Colorado, New Mexico, Wyoming, Montana, Nevada, and Utah would be the greatest beneficiaries under this provision. But States like Arkansas would benefit somewhat, and Missouri would benefit in a small way, and Oklahoma, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and some of the other States would benefit. It seems to me the provision is entirely fair. The difficulty we have in our western country in the construction of roads lies in the fact that we have but a small proportion of our area that is taxable, and from that comparatively small proportion of our area we must obtain all of the funds with which we construct our roads.

This amendment would simply put us on a fair and equitable basis as compared with States whose public lands have passed into private ownership, and I hope that the amendment may be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 3 and insert in lieu thereof the following:
"SEC. 3. For the purpose of improvement, construction, and maintenance, the rural roads of the country shall be classified into three classes, on the basis of the amount of traffic which the roads carry or are capable of carrying: Class A shall embrace interstate highways connected with a general system of highways thoughout the United States; class B shall embrace State highways, main branches, and feeders for the interstate highways which shall extend into every county within the State; class C shall embrace county highways and local post roads connected with a market town and with a main interstate or State highway.

"The Secretary of Agriculture shall, with the assistance of the Office of Public Roads of the Department of Agriculture, establish standard specifications as to grades, drainage, bridges, culverts, roadbeds, and the surfacing of the various classes of roads, having in view the topography of the country, the character of the soil, the climate, the kind and accessibility of road material. The Office of Public Roads of the Department of Agriculture shall continue the investigation and classification of scientific information upon the proper location, grading, drainage, construction, and maintenance of rural roads, and shall at all times furnish to State highway departments or highway engineers expert advice and assistance on such subjects."

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the chief objection I have had to this bill is that it provides only a little addition, in the way of the distribubtion of Federal money, to the already plenary power of the States in making improvements of roads. I do not believe that the road problem can be solved simply by adding this little drop in the bucket, in the way of the Federal distribution of money, to the plenary power of the States. If I thought so, I would not think there was any problem to be solved, because the States would have solved it long ago.

My idea is that the roads should be improved in accordance with their utility, not in accordance with the means possessed by the people to improve them, whether by means of funds obtained from licenses, called the "dram-shop fund," or otherwise, but only in accordance with how they are needed, and that is the only scientific way on which roads should be improved. This amendment of mine substitutes that idea for the roads-rental idea.

Now, gentlemen can denounce that as a "joy-riding" proposition if they choose, but any road that permits the easy passage of wheeled vehicles going over it can also be denounced in that way.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, willl the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. No; not now. I will yield in a minute, when I get through.

If I am not mistaken, the politicians are about 100 miles behind the people on this road proposition. I find here a bulletin of the Missouri State Board of Agriculture describing the State highway system of Missouri, and it is said that it was instituted by Gov. Folk, now Solicitor of the State Department.

I picked up a Kansas City newspaper last Saturday, and in it I found two items of particular interest here. One was an account of an intercounty road meeting attended by representatives of Clay County, in the district represented by my colleague, Judge ALEXANDER, and by representatives of Jackson County, in my own district, where they were interested in disdiscussing the project of building an intercounty highway under the law passed by the Legislature of the State of Missouri to connect with the existing system of State highways in Missouri and in a discussion of the way in which the plans are working. Another statement in the paper that interested me was an account of a road-boosters' meeting at Excelsior Springs, in the district represented by my colleague, Judge ALEXANDER, attended by delegates from both the States of Iowa and Missouri, where they discussed a proposed road to be called the "Canada interstate highway."

That was presided over by the Democratic State highway engineer, Mr. Frank W. Buffum. That is what they are actually doing in that State toward road improvement.

Are we to turn back the hand of time and say we will only build a road from the farm to the nearest railroad station? Of course, the railroad men are in favor of that, all of them; but that is not going to solve the road problem. What is going to solve the road problem is to find out what roads need improvement to bear the traffic of the country, and classify them as to the improvement they need and their utility to the community.

In order to do that we ought to have available the facilities of the Department of Agriculture and of the Bureau of Good Roads on the question of climate, of soil, of road material, of scientific drainage, of construction of bridges and culverts, of the control of surface water, and all of those matters that are now out of the reach of the road overseer or road boss who will have to make his little road on this $15 a mile. If gentlemen want to build a Chinese wall around a little road district and to say, "You can have $15 a mile if you drag your road, or $60 a mile if you can make a macadamized road with your own resources," that is one thing. If you want to get roads where they are needed—and very often roads must necessarily traverse districts which have small means—then you will commit yourselves to this broader plan, which I have endeavored to outline, of classifying roads as to their need of improvement according to the amount of use which they will receive.

Mr. HOWARD. Would not the effect of the gentleman's bill be that 25 years after this bill passed there would be no improvements upon the highways of this country at a distance of over 6 miles from a town?

Mr. BORLAND. No; I will tell you what will be the effect.

Mr. HOWARD. If it is based on tonnage?

Mr. BORLAND. No. If this bill passes and we appropriate $25,000,000 to be expended among the little road districts, and that money disappears, as it will, and we appropriate $25,000,000 next year and it disappears, and $25,000,000 the next year and it disappears, at the end of five or six years, at the very furthest, our constituents will be saying, "Where are those roads? Where is that $150,000,000 you have spent?" Every fellow who fights what he calls a peacock road bill has a latent subconsciousness that if he votes against it the boulevard will come by his door. It is not possible for it to come by every man's door, and you have got to select some route and determine it by the amount of use that will be made of it.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. I am not advised from any source that roads connecting the counties or connecting the States would not be of much service, but the first duty we owe is to the people of each of the counties. This bill is intended to encourage the construction of post roads. Whoever heard of post roads leading from one county to another or through the States under the modern system of carrying the mails? Our mails come to the chief cities of the county, and the post roads lead out from these centers to the people in the county. The object of this appropriation is to construct and encourage the building of such post roads, not boulevards from State to State nor from county to county. I know that intrastate and intracounty roads would be convenient for the traveling public and for automobilists, but they will not help the rural mail carrier, neither will they help the farmer materially to get his produce from the farm to the market to which he usually delivers his products for sale.

I am in favor of carrying out the provisions of this bill, so that we may have our mail rapidly and speedily carried to the people from the various centers and so that the farmer may be relieved from road conditions which are bad enough in America to cause men to lose their religion.

Mr. Chairman, I believe this committee has done its duty, although it is the youngest standing committee of this House, being less than 1 year old. About two years ago, as I recollect, a subcommittee was appointed to investigate this subject, with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] as its chairman; and he has devoted nearly the entire two years in hearings and investigations so as to arrive at the best system for the construction of post roads. During this Congress a Committee on Roads has been authorized, with Mr. SHACKLEFORD as its chairman. This committee has devoted much time in preparing this bill, which I regard as being most excellent; and if we undertake to depart from the main provisions embodied in the plan which this committee has offered us, in my opinion, we will make a mistake and we will get a much worse bill than the one which the committee has submitted to this House. We owe much to the people in presenting a measure which will not only be beneficial but sensible and practical.

I desire to say further, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is a very energetic, conscientious, high-minded gentleman, for whom I have always had the very highest respect; but I think he is mistaken on this proposition. I think he has not gone into the farming communities and learned the reason for this appropriation. I feel that he has not suffered the hardships of the rural mail carrier or the farmer in marketing the product of his farm over our miserable roads.

Mr. LANGLEY. He has not traveled over a dirt road.

Mr. FOWLER. No; I do not believe he has driven a wagon on a muddy road where the hubs are the only things that prevent the wheels from sinking entirely. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORLAND. I have not only driven a wagon, but have walked beside it.

Mr. FOWLER. If the gentleman has had such an experience——

Mr. BORLAND. I have had plenty of it——

Mr. FOWLER. Then he ought to join the friends of this bill and urge its immediate passage.

Mr. LANGLEY. He will join with the dirt-road statesmen. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; the quicker the better. He is a good man, and I know he wants to do the right thing.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. COX. Reserving the right to object, I want two minutes. I want to offer an amendment myself.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] wants five minutes, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE] five minutes, and the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT] wants two minutes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Then, I will ask to make it 15 minutes. I do not like to do this, but I am compelled to on account of the pressure for time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], in his argument both to-day and the other day, assumed that $60 per mile was the only amount of aid the Government could give a State. He seems to have overlooked section 3 of this bill, under which the system of roads and the kind of roads shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture and the State authorities. Now, if the State has its road system worked up in the way some of the Northern and Eastern States have, any State that desires to do so can build a road system costing any amount it desires per mile, provided the Secretary of Agriculture consents and agrees to it.

If they want a road that costs $5,000 or $10,000 a mile they can build one, and the United States Government will appropriate its half toward it. Of course the amount in the aggregate can not be more than the amount allotted to the State, but the State can determine, under this bill, whether it wants to have it all under section 3 or wants it under the reward plan, under section 4, receiving $60, $30, or $15 per mile, or it can take both systems if it so desires. In many States where we have State aid and are building good roads we will not want it under the reward plan of section 4. In States like Wisconsin and Michigan and a great many others the greater portion, at least, of the amount will be taken under section 3, and the State will unite with the Federal Government, under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, and map out some main-traveled roads suitable for the farmer and also roads that will form a part of a great system.

If they want to build a high-class road under this, they can build a $5,000 road or a $10,000 road. It depends on what the State and the Secretary of Agriculture agree on. The argument that $60 a mile is the largest amount that can be received by a State, if based upon fact, would be unanswerable and, of course, we would have to admit that that amount would be inadequate for States like New York that are spending a great deal of money on their highways, and Indiana and many of those States would not want to go in on that plan. But $60 per mile is not the maximum amount that a State can receive. Section 3 of the bill places no limit upon the amount per mile; the only limitation being the limitation placed by the State authorities and the Secretary of Agriculture. But there are States whose constitutions prevent any internal improvements, and where the State can not give aid to the localities, and the only system that these States could come in under would be a system like the one mentioned in section 4. So the bill gives the States a very wide latitude in using the fund, and every dollar that is expended is to be under the supervision of the State authorities and also under the supervision of the United States authorities. I do not think, unless both authorities are absolutely corrupt, that there could be a dollar wasted or any pork-barrel proposition made out of this meritorious measure.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] to say at the beginning of the debate to-day that this appropriation was intended very largely as an incentive to States to build good roads. I appreciate the desire to create a sentiment and an incentive for road construction, and in this connection I feel that I should refer to what has been done in the State of Massachusetts. We have been building there what are known as State highways for many years. The first appropriation was made in 1894, and it has become so popular that during the session of the legislature two years ago the law was amended so that each successive year we are to expend a million dollars annually for the construction, maintenance, and repair of what are known as State highways. We have about 950 miles of State highway, and have appropriated over $14,000,000.

These roads are not solely for the benefit of through travel, nor are they elegant boulevards solely for the use of automobiles, but they go into all the local communities, the small towns, and especially are the small towns cared for under this appropriation. A certain percentage each year is devoted to construction and maintenance under what is known as the small-town act. Farmers in our rural communities realize the great value of this enactment and are greatly benefited by its provisions.

Now, I feel that in this connection such a State as Massachusetts and others to which the last speaker referred should in some way or other secure some benefit from the fact that they have so long provided this form of construction. The apportionment system, while it may be absolutely fair and the best that the committee can work out, I feel is not satisfactory to such a State as I represent. The same thing occurred about a week ago in the so-called Lever agricultural bill. We accepted the provisions of that bill, although realizing it was contrary to the best interests of our State, because it was for the benefit of rural communities in other States. I suppose by the votes of the Members of this House the same thing will be done in connection with this bill, but the time is coming when the people of the States which seem to be always discriminated against will show their resentment.

I want to show you how unfair the ratio in certain Northern States will be as based on the report of the committee which I hold in my hand.

Alabama, with a percentage of population of 2.34 of the entire United States, receives	$578,000
Georgia, with 2.85 per cent of population, receives	771,000
Indiana, with 2.95 per cent of population, receives	1,016,000
North Carolina, with 2.41 per cent of population, receives	660,000
Oklahoma, with 1.81 per cent of population, receives	572,000
Tennessee, with 2.39 per cent of population, receives	706,000
Virginia, with 2.26 per cent of population, receives	591,000

Whereas, in comparison with all these, Massachusetts, with a percentage of population of 3.68, will only receive $538,000, provided the arrangement is made whereby we can reach the maximum of apportionment, which does not seem at all likely.

I do feel, Mr. Chairman, that some change in this method of apportionment ought to be found. If we are to have a bill appropriating the Federal revenue for the benefit of the States and the local communities, we ought to discover some way to do it upon a fair ratio and a fair basis. The Lever agricultural bill was at fault in that respect. This bill is at fault in the same respect, and it seems to me that we ought to be studying to secure a remedy so that every State would be fairly treated. The burden of taxation is easily and cheerfully placed upon our shoulders, but the distribution of the results of taxation seems to be invariably turned in the direction of the homes of the Democratic majority.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 3, page 4, strike out "one-half" and insert "one-third."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, as I announced Saturday, I am heartily in favor of the principle involved in this bill and have been for years, but I doubt seriously the wisdom of throwing one-half of the burden on the Government of the United States. I think the purpose of the bill in stimulating the States to get busy along these lines and improve the highways is a valuable purpose, and I believe if the Government contributes one-third and the States contribute two-thirds that our purpose will be fulfilled.

In the appropriation of $500,000 last year that was the regulation required by the Agricultural Department and the Post Office Department, whereby the Government put in a dollar and the State or subdivisions thereof put in $2. These appropriations are coming home to roost upon us. They are going to roost on our heads. Mark what I tell you. Even the Republican Party back in 1908 found that they did not have enough ground on which to stand and meet the expenses of the Government, and so they enacted a corporation tax which brought in $30,000,000 in the way of revenue to the United States. We have revised the tariff, and how large a revenue it is going to bring I do not know. We have enacted an income tax, and as for the amount of revenue that is an experiment, and how much it will bring I do not know, neither does anyone else. We are going to come to this point in a very few years if we adopt this policy of the Government paying half and the State paying half—we are coming to direct taxes. There is absolutely no escape from it, and whenever that time comes the people will ask us, What has become of these appropriations—what have you got to show for it? The moment we reach direct taxation for the support of the Federal Government, there will not be a Member of Congress left to tell the tale. Every man will be defeated.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman, in the two minutes which have been allotted to me, I wish to state that this question of road building can not possibly be considered as a national measure. The questions of benefit to private individuals, the questions of benefit to the local communities, must be considered on their own merits.

Throughout the length and breadth of the country the question of the right of each community to regulate its taxation for local purposes is the real burning issue.

To attempt by a Federal bill to cover questions of the rights and benefits in local communities is an abstract absurdity and becomes merely a question of distributing pork, as I have before stated and for which statement I offer no apologies.

With the right to extend my remarks, I suggest some quotations from one of the great poems of Oliver Wendell Holmes, entitled "The Specter Pig," which concerns the genesis and the manufacture of pork as applied to the present bill and to its chief proponents, with all due regard to the subsequent distribution of the product resultant from the slaying and the manufacture.

It was the stalwart butcher man
That knit his swarthy brow,
And said the gentle pig must die,
And sealed it with a vow.

And oh, it was the gentle pig
Lay stretched upon the ground,
And ah, it was the cruel knife
His little heart that found.

* * * *

It was the savage butcher, then,
That made a mock of sin,
And swore a very wicked oath
He did not care a pin.

It was the butcher's youngest son,
His voice was broke with sighs,
And with his pocket handkerchief
He wiped his little eyes.

All young and ignorant was he,
But innocent and mild,
And in his soft simplicity
Out spoke the tender child:

"Oh, father, father, list to me,
The pig is deadly sick,
And men have hung him by his heels
And fed him with a stick."

It was the bloody butcher, then,
That laughed as he would die,
Yet did he soothe the sorrowing child,
And bid him not to cry.

"Oh, Dorsey, Dorsey, what's a pig,
That thou shouldst weep and wail?
Come, bear thee like a butcher's child,
And thou shalt have his tail!"

It was the butcher's daughter then,
So slender and so fair,
That sobbed as if her heart would break,
And tore her yellow hair.

And thus she spoke in thrilling tone,
Fast fell the teardrops big:
"Ah! woe is me! Alas! Alas!
The pig! The pig! The pig!"

Then did her wicked father's lips
Make merry with her woe,
And call her many a naughty name,
Because she whimpered so.

* * * *

He slept, and troops of murdered pigs
Were busy with his dreams;
Loud rang their wild, unearthly shrieks,
Wide yawned their mortal seams.

The clock struck 12; the dead hath heard;
He opened both his eyes,
And sullenly he shook his tail
To lash the feeding flies.

One quiver of the hempen cord,
One struggle and one bound,
With stiffened limb and leaden eye
The pig was on the ground!

And straight toward the sleeper's house
His fearful way he wended;
And hooting owl and hovering bat
On midnight wing attended.

Back flew the bolt, up rose the latch,
And open swung the door;
And little mincing feet were heard,
Pat, pat, along the floor.

Two hoofs upon the sanded floor
And two upon the bed;
And they are breathing, side by side,
The living and the dead!

"Now wake, now wake, thou butcher man!
What makes thy cheek so pale?
Take hold! take hold! thou dost not fear
To clasp a specter's tail?"

Untwisted every winding coil,
The shuddering wretch took hold;
All like an icicle it seemed,
So tapering and so cold.

"Thou com'st with me, thou butcher man!"—
He strives to loose his grasp,
But faster than the clinging vine
Those twining spirals clasp.

And open, open swung the door,
And, fleeter than the wind,
The shadowy specter swept before,
The butcher trailed behind.

Fast fled the darkness of the night,
And morn rose faint and dim;
They called full loud, they knocked full long;
They did not waken him.

Straight, straight toward that oaken beam
A trampled pathway ran;
A ghastly shape was swinging there—
It was the butcher man.

Which references, Mr. Chairman, go to show the ultimate fate of the man who heedlessly contends for the distribution of pork as against the careful and deliberate judgment of the people who, whether or not they own the land, desire and have reason to expect equality of treatment by the Congress of the United States.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. ALLEN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 12235. An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

RURAL POST ROADS.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new section, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the section add the following as a new section:
"That no money shall be paid by the United States for the construction and maintenance of any rural post roads unless there is established and enforced upon such work an eight-hour day for all persons employed upon such work."

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, on that I make the point of order.

Mr. GOOD. But it is not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Missouri on the point of order.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That is the law now.

Mr. MANN. If it is the law now, it certainly is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Very well, go ahead. Before that is done, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the proposed new section and amendments thereto be limited to 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] contends that this is a reenactment of the law as it stands on the statute books to-day. If that is the case, I will ask the gentleman if he will not accept this amendment so as to dispel all dispute and doubt on this important question?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. No.

Mr. GOOD. The point is, Mr. Chairman, that this House has legislated time and time again with regard to great work of this kind, and never yet, when the question has been raised, have we failed to vote in favor of an eight-hour day, and I want to ask my friends on that side, as well as on this side, now that we are commencing for the first time the building of post roads by the Government of the United States, whether or not we are going to say to the farmers who will be called upon to build those roads that a different and longer day must be established for their work than we have established for other workmen in our arsenals and in all of the other public works in the Government of the United States where we employ labor. Why should the laborer from the farm, who will be called upon to do this work, put in more hours per day than does the laborer who is hired in our arsenals and in other public works of the Government? Eight hours a day is long enough for any man to work.

After a man upon the farm performs a day's labor upon the road he must go home and do the chores upon the farm. He must take care of his stock. I am only offering this amendment in order that he may be protected and that he may not be required to work 10 hours a day upon the roads and then 3 or 4 hours a day after his day's work has ended. What good reason exists for not fixing 8 hours for the day's work upon work of this kind? Absolutely none. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], who is the chairman of this great committee bringing in this bill providing for an expenditure of $25,000,000 a year, says that this is the law. If it is the law, then why not accept the amendment? But he says he will not accept the amendment. Half of those men will be called from the farms to do this work to improve our highways, and I simply ask the chairman of the committee if he will not grant them simple justice. They are entitled to this. They are entitled to every privelege that is given to other workmen employed on Government work in other lines of activity.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to enter into an argument with the gentleman; but, if he does not object, I will call his attention to a mistake that he is making. The farmer is not required to build this road. He is required to pay for it, and if you would rather that the farmer would work 15 hours a day on his farm and pay the convicts for labor they do for only 4 or 5 hours a day, then I have nothing to say.

Mr. GOOD. But in my State we do not have convict labor.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Hold on——

Mr. GOOD. Oh, I do not yield to the gentleman for an argument. I will say this, that to the honor of most of the States of this Union we do not employ convicts on our public highways. Is this $25,000,000 for the benefit of convicts or for the benefit of the farm laborers in the United States? That is a question I would like to have the gentleman answer when he gets the floor.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says this is not in aid of the farmers. Who is going to drag the roads but the farmer? If you do not get the farmer to drag the roads and improve them, where in the name of common sense will you get your laborers? You can not get the labor at all, and the gentleman knows it. In order to drag the roads and make good roads the work must be begun just as soon as the ground commences to dry after a rain, and the farmer and a team can not drag more than a few miles of road after a rain before the roads become too dry to work.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GOOD. I yield for a question.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The gentleman in his State wants the work to be done under the eight-hour basis?

Mr. GOOD. That is the provision of the amendment.

Mr. SAUNDERS. There is nothing in the bill to prevent the people in Iowa working in that way.

Mr. GOOD. But what about Virginia?

Mr. SAUNDERS. We do not want this work to bear on an eight-hour basis. We want the bill, but we want our convicts to work on our roads.

Mr. GOOD. But I understand there are gentlemen on that side representing the cities of Virginia who have voted time and time again to establish the eight-hour day, and who will not now discriminate against the honest farmer.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Then, let those gentlemen come forward.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I want to have just one minute. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has made numerous technical objections to this bill from time to time, most of which have been met, but he seems to have gotten a new one—about an eight-hour day—and he is objecting on the romantic basis that it is in the interest of the farmers of his country, who are going to help pay for building most of these roads. The farmer is not going to hire out up there to work the roads. Sometimes he goes out to aid the road building, but it is simply voluntary work; but the work that is paid for on the road will be paid for largely by the farmers whom the gentleman professes he is trying to help. He wants the farmer to work all day and all night on the farm and hire somebody else to work on the road for a few hours.

He says that he is opposed to working convicts on the road. That may be good policy in Iowa, but there are a number of States in the Union where they are working the convicts on the roads in order that they may take them out of competitive work in the shops. We want to take our convicts out onto the roads and work them, and do not want them to work in the shops under contract in competition with the square labor in the factories and in the trades. We believe that here is noncompetitive occupation where we can work the convict and make him earn a part of what he eats and where he can be in better health and where he will compete with nobody else. And it seems to me it is a humane as well as a profitable thing to do.

If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] wants to keep the convicts in their cells and let them die of dry rot or work in competition with the laboring classes of his State, and if he can induce the balance of the people of Iowa to do that, we have no right to object. But in Missouri and in other States we want to take the convict out of the competition with square labor. They have got to let him lie in his cell or take him out on the road and work him, where he competes with nobody. I have no hesitation in saying that in Missouri that is what we want to do.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. For a question; yes.

Mr. GOOD. Is not the gentleman in favor, then, of doing away with the eight-hour principle for all labor that is employed on Government work?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. We have this convict labor in Missouri, and we think the proper thing to do with it is to work it on the roads.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that, so far as we are concerned, we are now about to adopt a movement that will give to every man in the penitentiary a certain wage, and will try to make a better man of him instead of making a slave of him by putting him in chains on the highways.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will say to the gentleman that out in Colorado they work the convicts without even a guard. They do not even wear stripes or any other badge of infamy. They put them out on their honor, and they have built hundreds of miles of roads in Colorado under that system. They have not only built the roads, but they have built up the character of the convicts. They have taken the convict out in citizen's clothes and without a guard and worked him on the road. He comes out of prison at the end of his term not like out of most of our penitentiaries where we have had the old system, a worse man, but a better one. Thanks to Colorado for pointing the way for properly taking care of convicts. I do not know whether Iowa will follow, but Missouri will and other States will, and we hope to build up our convicts by a different system than by putting a ball and chain on them or letting them lie in their cells and rot.

Mr. GOOD. The bill was drawn along that line, was it?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. This bill shows upon its face how it was drawn, but it was drawn with a desire that we could get some of the States to take the convicts out of competition with square labor and put them at work upon the roads.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GOOD. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 23, noes 62.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. SHACKLEFORD and Mr. GOOD took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 33, noes 59.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That certain roads in the States which are adapted to use by the United States as rural post roads shall be divided into three classes to be known as class A, class B, and class C.

Class A shall embrace roads upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track composed of macadam or other material of equal utility and cost, constructed and maintained in such manner that it shall have a smooth, firm surface.

Class B shall embrace roads upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, well drained, with a road track composed of shells, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay or other material of equal utility but less expensive than macadam, constructed and maintained in such manner that it shall have a smooth, firm surface.

Class C shall embrace roads upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with adequate drainage and ample side ditches, with a roadway constructed so as to quickly shed water into the side ditches and kept crowned and compacted by dragging or other adequate means so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles.

That on or before the 1st day of March in each fiscal year the governor of any State may file in the office of the Secretary of Agriculture a statement setting forth the location and the number of miles of roads in such State which he claims to be in each of classes A, B, and C, respectively; and if such State have a State highway department then his said statement may be accompanied by a report from such State highway department showing the total number of miles of roads in such State in each of classes A, B, and C, the location of such roads, a description in detail of their physical features, the material, manner, and, as far as may be, the cost of their construction and the manner and cost of their maintenance.

That the Secretary of Agriculture shall consider such statements and determine which of the roads mentioned therein are in class A, which in class B, and which in class C, and make a report of his said determinations to the respective governors, filing such statements on or before the 20th day of the following June.

That no charge shall be made for so considering and determining such statement of any governor if the same shall be accompanied by a report from the State highway department of such State as hereinbefore provided, but in all other cases there shall be deducted 10 per cent of the amount which shall be payable on account of the roads in such State under the provisions of this act.

That at the end of each fiscal year the United States shall pay on account of the roads so determined to be in classes A, B, and C, as follows: On each mile in class A the sum of $60, on each mile in class B the sum of $30, and on each mile in class C the sum of $15: Provided, That if in any State the aggregate of said sums would exceed the amount which for that fiscal year has been apportioned to such State under this act to be expended under the provisions of this section, then said sums per mile shall be reduced pro rata so that their aggregate shall not exceed said amount.

That nothing whatever shall be paid by the United States under the provisions of this section for any road which does not clearly come within the requirements of class A, B, or C, as hereinbefore defined.

That such payments shall be made to such officers of the respective States as the governors thereof shall designate as being entitled to receive the same by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Secretary of Agriculture.

That such payments of money made by the United States, as hereinbefore provided, shall, during the ensuing year, be applied to the construction, maintenance, or extension of the respective roads for which paid, and that in addition thereto the State or civil subdivision thereof shall, during said ensuing fiscal year, expend in the construction, maintenance, or extension of said roads an amount equal to the amount so paid by the United States; that if such sums are not so expended upon the construction, maintenance, or extension of said roads, respectively, during ensuing fiscal year, then at the end of such fiscal year nothing whatever shall be paid by the United States on account of any road upon which there has been a default in such expenditure; that the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine whether such expenditures have been so made, and to aid him in such determinations that the proper officers of the State shall make such showing as he shall require.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Have you read to the end of that section?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Then I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUBEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11686, the good-roads bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD if I so desire.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 10, 1914.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Jehovah, Father, Thou art our God. All of the excellency of life cometh from Thy hand. Not anything good of life has come from beyond Thee. The delight of life is in Thy saints, who are the excellent of the earth. Thou hast given to us a divine and personal inspiration. Thou hast quickened us also by our own meditation upon Thy name. Surely Thou wilt not leave our spirit life in the shades of death. Thou wilt deliver us with a complete and full satisfaction. Thou wilt show us the fount of life. In Thy presence there is fullness of joy. At Thy right hand there are pleasures forevermore. All the blessings of life we seek to find through the merit and mediation of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REPORT OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Interstate Commerce Commission, calling attention to an error in the report of the commission submitted to the Senate January 20, 1914, with reference to the name of Daniel G. Reid as an official of the American Creosoting Co. The communication will be printed in the RECORD and will lie on the table for the present.

The communication is as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, February 9, 1914.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, Washington.

SIR: On page 55 of the commission's report of the investigation of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad, the Chicago & Eastern Illinois Railroad, and the St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railway, submitted to the Senate under date of January 20, 1914, appears the following paragraph:

"Inquiries developed the fact that Daniel G. Reid, of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway, is one of the officials of the creosoting company, and the information that similar contracts were executed at the same time by the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific and the Chicago & Eastern Illinois with the American Creosoting Co."

It will be noted that this paragraph states that inquiries developed the fact that Daniel G. Reid was one of the officials of the creosoting company. Information to that effect was given to us, but witnesses examined by us were not able to either affirm or deny it.

Mr. Daniel G. Reid now writes us, stating that he has never at any time been an official of the American Creosoting Co. or of any corporation controlled by or allied with it in the creosoting business and that he has never been financially interested in said corporations in any manner whatsoever.

Mr. Reid's statement is confirmed by a telegram from Mr. A. T. Hert, president of the American Creosoting Co., to Mr. R. A. Jackson, of the legal department of the Great Northern Railway.

It seems under the circumstances appropriate and just that we should transmit this information to the Senate.

Respectfully,

E. E. CLARK, Chairman.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. LODGE, and by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That Mr. WEEKS be appointed a member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

On motion of Mr. LODGE, and by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That Mr. BRADY be appointed a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF TELEPHONES (S. DOC. NO. 417).

Mr. GALLINGER. On the 22d day of January, at my request, an editorial from the London Daily Mail on the Government ownership and operation of telephone lines in Great Britain was inserted in the RECORD. It is a very brief article. I now ask that it be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

TRUCK SOILS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a copy of an article by J. A. Bonsteel, scientist in the Soils Survey, on the subject of truck soils of the Atlantic coast region. The article is accompanied by illustrations, and I would like to have it printed as a public document. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing for their consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken.

INDIAN IRRIGATION.

Mr. MYERS. I ask to have printed as a public document a brief on Indian irrigation prepared under the direction of the Board of Indian Commissioners by F. H. Abbott. I ask that the matter be referred to the Committee on Printing, and I especially request the committee to make a speedy report upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The matter will be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE FOR PENNSYLVANIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, receding from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 1 to the bill (H. R. 32) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate recede from its amendment to the title of the bill. It is an amendment proposing to change the title of the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate recedes from its amendment, and the bill stands passed.

Mr. OVERMAN. In order that the clerks will understand I will state that the report sent here from the House is a little incorrect. I wish to explain it so that the clerks will understand it when it goes into the RECORD.

This bill went into conference. The Senate insisted upon one of its amendments and receded from another. One amendment was not taken up. The bill went back to the House, and the House receded from its disagreement, and asked us to recede from the amendment which provided for changing the title of the bill. I have moved that we recede as to the amendment put on in the Senate changing the title, and that we recede only from that.

Mr. GALLINGER. That probably keeps it right; but it occurs to me if it had been included in the report that the Senate recede from its amendment it would have completed the matter.

Mr. OVERMAN. It ought to have been included. It is a mistake on the part of some clerk. I make this statement in order that the clerks may understand the matter in making the report.

PRESIDENTIAL PRIMARIES.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Tuesday, the 17th day of February, I shall address the Senate on the presidential primaries bill and on current politics related to that subject.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION IN LOUISIANA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. THORNTON. Before any other business is taken up I should like to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3210) to establish a fish-cultural station at some point in the State of Louisiana. My reason for making the request is that under the provisions of the bill the Louisiana Legislature must pass certain legislation before it becomes effective. The legislature will shortly adjourn, and it will not meet again for two years, and unless the bill can be disposed of at the present session it will be two years before it can be made effective under its provisions. For that reason I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Fisheries with an amendment, to add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That before any final steps shall have been taken for the construction of a fish-cultural station in accordance with this act, the State of Louisiana, through appropriate legislative action, shall accord to the United States Commissioner of Fisheries and his duly authorized agents the right to conduct fish hatching and all operations connected therewith in any manner and at any time that may by them be considered necessary and proper, any fishery laws of the State to the contrary notwithstanding: And provided further, That the operations of said hatchery may be suspended by the Secretary of Commerce whenever, in his judgment, the laws and regulations affecting the fishes cultivated are allowed to remain so inadequate as to impair the efficiency of said hatchery.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the establishment of a fish-cultural station at some point in the State of Louisiana, including the purchase of site, construction of building, and equipment, to be selected by the Secretary of Commerce: Provided, That before any final steps shall have been taken, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AUXILIARY FISH-CULTURAL STATIONS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 797) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Minnesota.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Fisheries with amendments.

The amendments were, in line 1, to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$50,000; in line 5, to strike out "a fish-cultural station" and insert "auxiliary fish-cultural stations connected with the present hatchery at Duluth"; in line 7, to strike out "site" and insert "sites"; and in line 9, to strike out "point" and insert "points," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the establishment of auxiliary fish-cultural stations connected with the present hatchery at Duluth, in the State of Minnesota, including purchase of sites, construction of buildings and ponds, and equipment, at some suitable points in the State, to be selected by the Secretary of Commerce.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to establish auxiliary fish-cultural stations in the State of Minnesota."

NAVAL ACADEMY CHAPEL AND AUDITORIUM.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2830) making appropriation for the correction of the acoustics, by the Harper system, of the United States Naval Academy chapel and auditorium.

Mr. SMOOT. The morning business has closed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not going to object to the consideration of this bill, but I will ask that the calendar, under Rule VIII, be taken up immediately after the bill has been disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 5, after the word "acoustics," to strike out "by the Harper system"; in line 9, before the word "satisfactory," to strike out "The said Harper shall give" and to insert "A"; in line 10, after the word "bond," to insert "shall be given by the contractors for the system"; on page 2, after the word "Navy," at the end of line 7, to strike out "and"; in the same line, after the words "Bureau of Navigation," to strike out "the money shall be paid: Provided, however, That after the installation of the Harper system should the acoustics of the chapel and" and to insert "and a like number familiar with the problems involved to be named by the Secretary of the Navy, the final money shall be paid: Provided, however, That after the installation of the new system should the acoustics of the chapel and"; and in line 16, after the word "said," to strike out the name "Harper" and insert "contractor," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $8,600 for the correction of the acoustics of the United States Naval Academy chapel and auditorium, $6,000 for the chapel and $2,600 for the auditorium; the same to be immediately available and paid out upon the order of the Secretary of the Navy. A satisfactory bond shall be given by the contractors for the system in an amount to be fixed by the Secretary of the Navy conditioned upon the successful and satisfactory accomplishment of the improvement to the acoustics of the two buildings above mentioned. When the work is done, and approved by a board composed of the chairmen of the two Naval Committees of Congress, the Secretary of the Navy, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, and a like number familiar with the problems involved to be named by the Secretary of the Navy, the final money shall be paid: Provided, however, That after the installation of the new system should the acoustics of the chapel and the auditorium be not satisfactory to the above-mentioned board the said contractor shall be required to restore the chapel and the auditorium to the condition in which they were before the alterations were undertaken, without any expense to the Government.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will inquire of the Senator from Maine, in which building is the auditorium?

Mr. JOHNSON. Though I have been there twice, I am unable to state to the Senator from New Hampshire. I think, however, it is in the same building as is the chapel. I know that the acoustic properties are very bad in the chapel, and that the authorities are compelled to hang a blanket there at the present time to improve the conditions.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been wondering, Mr. President, as the bill was being read—I shall not object to it, of course, because the committee has examined it—whether either the architect or the builder might not be held responsible for constructing these costly buildings and leaving the auditorium and chapel in such condition that they have to be improved by an appropriation by Congress. I do not know who is to blame—possibly nobody is to blame, I do not know how that is—and yet we spent a great deal of money to erect those buildings; they were very expensive buildings; and it strikes me as rather singular that the acoustic properties should not have been properly attended to when they were being constructed.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know who is responsible for the present conditions, but I know they are very bad; and it is sought in this way to overcome them.

Mr. GALLINGER. I agree with the Senator on that point, because I have personal knowledge of the fact that the conditions there are very bad.

Mr. JOHNSON. After a full consideration of the matter, the Committee on Naval Affairs made a unanimous report. The amendment suggested does not limit the improvement to the Harper system, but leaves it open to the adoption of any system under these conditions.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I may say, in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] directed to the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON], that the auditorium and the chapel are not in the same building.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was fully aware of that fact, and yet I had quite forgotten exactly the building in which the auditorium is located. I think it is a large building, if I recall it.

Mr. WORKS. Yes; it is in one of the large buildings.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill making appropriation for the correction of the acoustics of the United States Naval Academy chapel and auditorium."

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women was announced as first in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is detained from the Chamber. He has requested me to ask that this joint resolution be passed over to-day, as there are one or two Senators who have notified him that they desire to speak upon it. For that reason, I ask that the joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will go over.

LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE BUREAU.

The bill (S. 1240) to establish the legislative reference bureau of the Library of Congress was announced as next in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

MEDAWAKANTON AND WAHPAKOOTA (SANTEE) SIOUX INDIANS.

The bill (S. 1760) for the restoration of annuities to the Medawakanton and Wahpakoota (Santee) Sioux Indians, declared forfeited by the act of February 16, 1863, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, on page 3, section 3, line 24, after the words "quantum meruit," to insert "not to exceed 10 per cent of the amount recovered," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That proceedings shall be commenced by petition, verified by the attorney or firm of attorneys so authorized by John Eastman, assignee of Charles A. Eastman or Charles Hill, the attorneys in fact employed by said Indians under a contract bearing date November 27, 1896, approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs June 29, 1897, and by the Secretary of the Interior July 1, 1897, and said suit shall be conducted by said attorney or firm of attorneys as attorneys of record, together with other counsel appearing in the case; and the court shall find and award upon a quantum meruit not to exceed 10 per cent of the amount recovered to said attorneys and their associates the compensation which shall be paid to them for services rendered and to be rendered, and distribute the sum thus awarded to such attorneys and their associates as their respective interests may appear, under agreements among themselves, which may be filed with the court, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to pay the said sum of money to the said attorneys immediately upon rendition of final judgment, out of the proceeds of such judgment, if any, when an appropriation therefor shall be made by Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the bill go over until I can investigate it.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from North Carolina will not ask that the bill go over. It is a bill that has passed this body during each Congress since 1906, down to and including the second session of the Sixty-second Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that the amendment proposes to strike out the words "quantum meruit" and insert "not exceeding 10 per cent." Why not let the court find the amount upon a quantum meruit?

Mr. CLAPP. The words "quantum meruit" are not stricken out. The amendment was put in as a limitation upon the court to keep the attorneys from charging more than 10 per cent of the amount recovered.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know whether they are entitled to 10 per cent. I know the Supreme Court of the United States has decided time and time again, and the Court of Claims has that question before it now, that the contracts of attorneys who come before the departments representing Indians are void as against public policy. I think I should like to investigate the bill. I will not antagonize it.

Mr. CLAPP. I have no objection to the Senator investigating the bill, but I want to put the Senator right on one point. The 10 per cent clause was put in there as a limitation on the court in allowing the attorneys' fees.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am willing to trust the courts of this country. If they say the attorneys are entitled to more than 10 per cent, they ought to have it; but when you say "not exceeding 10 per cent" they may recover—how much is the amount involved?

Mr. CLAPP. That is something I can not tell.

Mr. OVERMAN. It may be $10,000,000; it may be similar to the Oklahoma claim, in which the attorneys were allowed $2,000,000. I am willing to let the courts of justice say what the attorneys' fees shall be upon a quantum meruit.

Mr. CLAPP. I am willing that the Senator should strike out the limitation, if he insists upon it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to look into the bill, and I ask that it go over for the day.

Mr. CLAPP. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

Mr. BRISTOW. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 120, being Senate bill 156.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that we are on the calendar now in regular order.

Mr. BRISTOW. Very well. I will inquire what is the next order of business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

The SECRETARY. Order of Business 66, being the bill (S. 654) to accept the cession by the State of Montana of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced within the Glacier National Park, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that Order of Business 66, Order of Business 67, and Order of Business 68, being Senate bills 654, 655, and 657, go over until the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is present, as he told me the other day he had some amendments to offer to them. I will say, however, that if the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] knows what those amendments are and desires to offer them now, I will not interpose any objection.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I, myself, was going to ask that Order of Business No. 66 go over, because my colleague [Mr. WALSH] has some amendments which he wishes to offer to that bill. I have just telephoned him and asked him to be present. I was not aware that he had any amendments which he wished to offer to Order of Business 67 or Order of Business 68. Is the Senator from Utah sure that he has?

Mr. SMOOT. I am not really positive, but on yesterday or Saturday—I forget which day—when I asked the junior Senator from Montana if he wanted the bills to go over, as he had already requested upon a previous occasion, he stated that he had some amendments which he desired to offer. The senior Senator from Montana may know better than I whether his colleague has amendments to offer only to one of the bills or to all three of the bills; I can not say positively.

Mr. MYERS. I think my colleague originally asked that the bills go over because I was absent on the day they were reached. I know that he has amendments to offer to Order of Business 66, and I was going to ask that that bill go over. He has never mentioned to me having amendments to offer to Order of Business 67 and Order of Business 68, and I do not believe that he can have, in the nature of the case, any amendment to offer to Order of Business 68, although he may have to Order of Business 67. I ask that Order of Business 66 and Order of Business 67, being Senate bills 654 and 655, go over and that Order of Business 68, being Senate bill 657, be considered. I do not think there can be any objection to that bill.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator is sure that his colleague does not desire to offer an amendment to that bill, I will not object.

Mr. MYERS. I do not think my colleague has any amendment to offer to Order of Business No. 68, being Senate bill 657; and, as it is only a minor bill, I do not see any occasion for it to go over.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask that it go over to-day, because, as I observe, the title of the bill is "to authorize the reservation of public lands for country parks and community centers within reclamation projects, and for other purposes."

Mr. MYERS. I will say that that bill has been twice reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Public Lands—once in this Congress and once in the last Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if the bill passed the Senate at the last session of Congress?

Mr. MYERS. I do not remember whether it did or not.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No.

Mr. SMOOT. I think there were a number of Senators who then objected to it. I believe the bill will lead to discussion, and therefore I ask the Senator to let it go over to-day. Meantime I will ascertain whether there is any objection to it.

Mr. MYERS. Very well; let it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senate bills 654, 655, and 657 will be passed over.

PUNISHMENT FOR CERTAIN CRIMES.

The bill (S. 2674) to define certain crimes and to provide punishment therefor was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, this will be recognized by the Senate as some legislation which the committee found necessary, growing out of the investigation of the lobby and particularly the case of one Lamar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendments reported by the committee.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in section 1, page 1, line 5, after the word "Member," to insert "or an employee"; in line 6, after the word "telephone," to strike out the word "or"; in line 7, after the word "telegraph," to insert "mail or otherwise"; on page 2, line 4, before the words "of Congress," to insert "or employee"; on line 6, after the word "not," to strike out "not less than three nor"; and on line 7, after the word "not," to strike out "less than $1,000 nor," so as to make the section read:

That any person who, in communicating with another by telephone or otherwise, personates or falsely represents that he is a Member or an employee of Congress or officer of the United States; or who, in communicating by telephone, telegraph, mail or otherwise, with another, the latter being in a State or district other than the State or district in which the said person then is, personates another or falsely represents himself to be some other person; or who, in any communication, oral, written, or printed, concerning any legislative matter theretofore or then pending or proposed in the Congress of the United States, falsely represents himself to be acting with the authority or in behalf of any Member or employee of Congress or officer of the United States, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be imprisoned for not more than five years, and shall be fined not more than $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 13, after the word "any," to strike out "legislative"; on line 18, after the word "not," to strike out "less than one nor"; and on line 19, after the word "not," to strike out "less than $1,000 nor," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That any person who, in any communication, public or private, shall falsely state that he has influenced, or brought to bear influence or attempted to bring to bear influence, upon any Member of Congress or officer of the United States concerning any matter theretofore or then pending or proposed in the Congress of the United States, or concerning the administration of the laws of the United States, other than lawful influence of right, reason, and justice, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be imprisoned for not more than three years, and shall be fined not more than $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 2, line 22, before the word "matter," to strike out "legislative"; on page 3, line 1, after the word "any," to strike out "such"; on line 2, after the word "officer," to strike out "thereof" and insert "of the United States,"; on line 5, after the word "not," to strike out "less than five nor"; and on line 6, after the word "not," to strike out "less than $5,000 nor," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That any person who, with respect to any matter pending or proposed in the Congress of the United States, or with respect to the administration of any law of the United States, brings to bear, directly or indirectly, or attempts to bring to bear, directly or indirectly, any influence intended to affect the action of any Member of Congress or officer of the United States, or relating thereto, other than the lawful influence of right, reason, and justice, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction shall be imprisoned not more than 10 years, and shall be fined not more than $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION, LONG ISLAND, N. Y.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 2811, to establish a fish-cultural station on Long Island, in the State of New York. I am informed that some similar bills——

Mr. BRISTOW. Unless we are going to take up the bills in their regular order, I shall have to object.

Mr. SMOOT. Regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the Senate will proceed in the regular order.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Very well.

DWIGHT MISSION SCHOOL, OKLAHOMA.

The bill (S. 2725) authorizing the sale of certain lands to the Dwight Mission School, on Sallisaw Creek, Okla., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, on page 2, line 5, after the word "therefor," to strike out "not less than," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the principal chief of the Cherokee Nation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, is hereby authorized to convey to the Dwight Mission School, on Sallisaw Creek, Okla., 26 acres of land heretofore set aside in accordance with the provisions of section 24 of the Cherokee agreement, approved July 1, 1902 (32 Stats. L., 716, 720), for the use of such school for missionary and educational purposes, and now being occupied and used by the said Dwight Mission School, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to accept in payment therefor $10 per acre.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to ask for an explanation of this bill. Does it refer to Indian land or Government land, or what is it?

Mr. SMOOT. I observe that there is a favorable report on the bill by Hon. A. A. Jones, Acting Secretary of the Interior, with a certain amendment; and I notice in the bill that it is amended.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That does not explain the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware that that does not explain the bill, as I have not read the report.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Is there a committee report on the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a committee report; yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am not objecting to the bill. I am simply asking for information.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I should like to get some information as to what the Dwight Mission School is.

Mr. LODGE. Let the report be read. There is a full report. I suggest that the report be read, as there is nobody here from the committee to explain the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I request that the report be read, then.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask that the bill be passed over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

REPUBLIC COAL CO., OF MONTANA.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or lease certain public lands to the Republic Coal Co., a corporation, was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution was read as in Committee of the Whole on February 7.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is opposed to this joint resolution. He is not present.

Mr. KENYON. I am sure there are a number of Senators who are opposed to it. I am going to ask that it may be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2242) making it unlawful for any Member of Congress to serve on or solicit funds for any political committee, club, or organization, was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether that bill would prevent a Member of Congress from serving on the Democratic or the Republican congressional committee?

Mr. GALLINGER. It would.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], who has charge of that matter, is not here; but the bill does so provide.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I ask that it go over. I wish to look at the report.

Mr. KENYON. It strikes me that that is one of the best features of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. It may be.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 3112) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to acquire certain right of way near Engle, N. Mex., was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask to have that bill passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

REPUBLIC COAL CO., OF MONTANA.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should like to ask how we got past Senate joint resolution 41?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was objection to its present consideration.

Mr. MYERS. May I ask who made the objection?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] was one of the Senators who objected.

Mr. KENYON. I will say to the Senator from Montana that when the joint resolution was up the other day there were several Senators who desired to hear more discussion of it. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] was one of those Senators. He is not present. For my part I should like to hear further explanation of the resolution.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from Nebraska, as I understand, has stated that he has no objection to the consideration of the joint resolution in his absence; that is, he has stated that he would not request that it go over if he could not be here.

Mr. KENYON. I have no authority to speak for the Senator from Nebraska. I was not making the objection on his account at all; but at the time the morning business closed, or at the time the joint resolution was laid aside for the day, there was a very interesting discussion taking place as to its merits. I was anxious to have that discussion go on, so that we might have some further light on the joint resolution. I intend to vote against it, but I do not want to put anything in the way of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to have the Senator withdraw his objection, if he will. I have said about all I care to say about the joint resolution. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] has some amendments to offer which he thinks will put the resolution in better shape. I understand he is ready to offer them now and will explain them to the Senate.

While I do not wish to be captious about objections, I really should prefer to have the joint resolution allowed to come up on its merits, if the Senator sees fit to withdraw his objection.

Mr. KENYON. While I may be entirely wrong, I simply have a feeling that there ought to be a full attendance of the Senate during the discussion of this joint resolution.

Mr. MYERS. That we shall never get, Mr. President. If that is the case, the joint resolution never will be considered.

Mr. KENYON. The only good thing I can see about the joint resolution is that the Senator from Montana is pushing it. Personally, I do not like the looks of the measure.

Mr. MYERS. I thank the Senator for that, but I beg to assure him that there is much more merit than that in the joint resolution. That is the least of its merits.

Mr. KENYON. That is the greatest merit I have been able to see in it. However, I will withdraw my objection; but I shall insist on as full an attendance as we can have before a vote is taken upon this matter.

Mr. MYERS. I shall be very glad to have that. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator from Iowa withdraws his objection, I will renew the objection to the consideration of the joint resolution. I should like to look through it myself before it is acted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

DISPOSAL OF INDIAN LANDS.

The bill (S. 2651) providing for the purchase and disposal of certain lands containing kaolin, kaolinite, fuller's earth, and other minerals within portions of Indian reservations heretofore opened to settlement and entry was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That all lands containing minerals, except those hereinafter specifically reserved, within such parts of Indian reservations as have heretofore been opened to settlement and entry under acts of Congress which did not authorize the disposal of such mineral lands, shall be open to exploration and purchase and be disposed of under the general provisions of the mining and coal-land laws of the United States, and the proceeds arising therefrom shall be deposited in the Treasury for the same purpose for which the proceeds arising from the disposal of other lands within the reservation in which such mineral-bearing lands are located were deposited: Provided, That all lands containing valuable deposits of oil, natural gas, phosphates, nitrates, potash, and asphaltic minerals are hereby expressly reserved from location and disposition pending future action by Congress, and lands containing fuller's earth, kaolin, china clay, and ball clay shall be disposed of under the provisions of law relating to placer mining claims, but the same person, association, or corporation shall not locate or enter more than one claim, not exceeding 160 acres in area, hereunder: Provided further, That none of the lands or mineral deposits, the disposal of which is herein provided for, shall be disposed of at less price than that fixed by the applicable mining or coal-land laws, and in no instance at less than their appraised value for agricultural purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I have had a conversation with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], who has reported this bill. I had formerly objected to its consideration. I have withdrawn the objection because, after more careful study of it, I do not think it establishes the precedent which I thought it established at the time I made the request that it go over.

Without delaying the bill, I take this occasion to say that I do not believe any Executive order creating a reservation carries with it any mineral lands known under the general mining act of 1872; that those lands still remain open to settlement and purchase by any citizen of the United States.

It was because I felt that this bill might be considered as a precedent in the way of recognition that a Federal order could so convey the mineral lands of the United States that I made the objection that I did. However, I have withdrawn it for the reason stipulated; and my purpose in making this statement is that, as far as I am concerned, it shall not be taken as a recognition of the right of an Executive order to convey such mineral lands.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to object to the consideration of this measure. There is a proviso to this effect:

That all lands containing valuable deposits of oil, natural gas, phosphates, nitrates, potash, and asphaltic minerals are hereby expressly reserved from location and disposition pending future action by Congress.

And so forth.

That seems to me to be a rider on this bill which has no limit in its application and which may be construed as a withdrawal by Congress of vast quantities of the public lands that to-day are open to location. I therefore object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. STERLING. Of course, it may be too late to obviate the objection made by the Senator from Colorado, but I should like to call his attention to the report made by the committee, embodying, as it does, the letter of the Acting Secretary of the Interior. I call his attention to page 2 of the letter of the Acting Secretary of the Interior, where the statement is made that—

With respect to deposits of oil, natural gas, phosphates, nitrates, potash, and asphaltic minerals, it seems to be generally admitted that the present mining laws are not appropriate to their disposition, and large areas of public lands containing the deposits have been withdrawn by the President under the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat., 847), for classification and pending legislation by Congress.

The Assistant Secretary of the Interior seems to recognize the fact that there have been withdrawals, and that there is some legislation necessary affecting this particular class of land. Hence the reason for the reservation made in the bill that these lands shall not be open to exploration and purchase as are the other mineral lands mentioned in the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the present Commissioner of Indian Affairs approve the bill?

Mr. STERLING. I can not say as to that. It has not been submitted to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, but it was submitted by the Committee on Public Lands to the Secretary of the Interior, and he makes this report.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The bill refers to Indian reservation lands?

Mr. STERLING. Yes. I will say to the Senator from Texas it is for the purpose of permitting the exploration and purchase of these mineral lands which are Indian reservation lands, with the exceptions named in the bill, that land containing natural gas, oil, nitrate, potash, and lands of that kind are specifically reserved pending future legislation by Congress, while in the reference to lands containing fuller's earth, kaolin, and kaolinite special provision is made in the bill. I will say to the Senator that it is the purpose of the bill to admit really the exploration and purchase of lands containing fuller's earth, kaolin, and kaolinite, and subject them to purchase on the same terms as is provided for the purchase of mineral lands generally.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It seems to me the Commissioner of Indian Affairs ought to be consulted regarding a measure of this kind.

Mr. STERLING. It would seem to me, as the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior is over this entire subject, from his examination of it and his acquaintance with it, he ought to decide the question.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator from Colorado will allow me, I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota what significance he gives to that part of the amendment that has been spoken of by the Senator from Colorado:

Provided, That all lands containing valuable deposits of oil, natural gas, phosphates, nitrates, potash, and asphaltic minerals are hereby expressly reserved from location and disposition.

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator I give to it simply the significance given to it by the Secretary of the Interior himself.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. May I ask what is the Senator's view of it? Would it not have the effect of withdrawing from all sorts of entry lands containing deposits of oil, natural gas, and phosphate until the further action of Congress?

Mr. STERLING. I think not. The Secretary of the Interior says it is conceded that the present mining laws are inappropriate for the disposition of this particular class of land.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not take the Secretary's word as absolute verity in that particular, because many people believe that the present mining laws are all right. It seems to me that the portion which has been referred to by the Senator from Colorado absolutely withdraws by legislative action all lands of that sort from entry.

Mr. THOMAS. There is no question of it, Mr. President.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will permit me, it seems to have been recognized by Congress heretofore that there is no legislation appropriate for the disposition of this particular class of land, and there are several bills, as stated by the Secretary of the Interior, pending with that object in view.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I know there are several bills pending, and yet there is legislation under which these lands may be brought to a useful purpose, and that legislation might well hold until further legislation is provided by Congress.

I want to say to the Senator that, while I have no objection at all to the subject matter which he desires to reach, yet this provision in the bill would lead to more than one day's discussion on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, this bill, I think, is a good example of many acts of legislation by Congress in which——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. Has objection been made to the consideration of the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection has been made and the bill has gone over. If there is further objection, the regular order, which is the next business on the calendar, will be proceeded with.

Mr. GALLINGER. Under those circumstances I think we ought to proceed with the calendar.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator objects, of course I shall——

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not object except that I understood the bill had gone over. I will not object to the Senator making a statement.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wanted to say, if I may be permitted—and that is what I started to say—that the title of the bill gives no indication whatever of this proviso. The title of the bill as well as its substance has been changed in consequence of the recommendation of the Department of the Interior, and under the title of a bill "providing for the purchase and disposal of certain lands containing kaolin, kaolinite, fuller's earth, and other minerals within portions of Indian reservations heretofore opened to settlement and entry" there has been introduced a proviso by way of an amendment "that all lands"—not the lands of Indian reservations, but all the public domain of the United States—"containing valuable deposits of oil, natural gas, phosphate, nitrate, potash, and asphaltic minerals are hereby expressly reserved from location and disposition pending future action by Congress." The effect of that might be to withdraw 50 per cent of the public domain of the United States from entry or from location, and the reason given, as I understand from the report——

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will allow me just a moment—the reason given by the Assistant Secretary of the Interior is that the existing laws are not applicable to deposits of this character, and as a consequence further legislation upon the subject is necessary.

I quite agree that it requires a great stretch of construction to make the present mineral laws, and especially those concerning this class of deposits, applicable to provisions like that; but it is nevertheless a fact that for over 30 years this law has been made applicable to the location and acquisition of title to property of this kind, and it ought to be good enough for that purpose or other purposes until Congress shall, by appropriate legislation, enact some other measure. Instead of that, this proposes to withdraw absolutely this land from occupation, purchase, and acquisition of title by private individuals.

I now yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I suggest the following amendment, and I think it will meet the objection of the Senator from Colorado——

Mr. THOMAS. It may be, but I understand the bill has gone over.

Mr. GALLINGER. The regular order!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I wish to make an inquiry. I did not understand that prior to the inquiry made by the Senator from New Hampshire there had been a positive objection.

Mr. THOMAS. I made the objection myself.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator made it, of course that sends the bill over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next business on the calendar will be stated.

TELEGRAMS SENT BY SENATORS ON PUBLIC BUSINESS.

The next business on the calendar was Senate resolution 156, submitted by Mr. SHAFROTH August 7, 1913, and reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate by Mr. WILLIAMS November 3, 1913, as follows:

Resolved, That the expenditures for telegrams sent or received by Senators on public business, payable out of the contingent fund of the Senate, be, and is hereby, limited to a sum not exceeding $60 per annum for each Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] made this report, but he requested me to present the matter to the Senate. I wish to say just a few words in relation to the resolution.

We had an investigation before the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate relative to the amount of moneys that have been charged by the respective Senators upon official telegrams. We have found that there has been a great difference in the amounts Senators have charged. For instance, the three highest sums charged for the three months of January 1 to April 1, 1913, and that was the only period which we investigated, was for one Member $210.14, for another Member $105.62, and for another Member $100.42, whereas the bills which some Senators have presented show a charge on account of official business for seven telegrams which did not exceed 54 cents for the three months, one not exceeding 97 cents——

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator if he struck off an average so as to show what on the average the charges would be?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will get to that in a moment. Another Senator charged 97 cents, another Senator 26 cents, another Senator $3.42 for the three months, another Senator $3.07, another Senator $2.66, another Senator $3.72, another Senator $2.69, another Senator $4.32. That was for the period of three months, from January 1, 1913, to April 1, 1913. Another Senator charged $2.82, another Senator $1.23, another Senator $1.34, another Senator $3.53, another Senator $1.15, another Senator $1.22, another Senator $1.43, another Senator $4.51. I think that the average charge for the telegrams which were sent by all of them amounted to somewhere near $8 a month.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, the average for each Senator for the three months was 45 telegrams, and the average cost for each Senator for the three months was $26.27.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That would make about $8.70 a month on the average for each Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator will find that in the report.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I observe by the report that the amount expended for the three months was $2,522.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Colorado will pardon me, I will give the Senator the information from the report. The Senator from Colorado has not the report in his hands and I have it in mine.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask the Secretary to read the report, and I ask the attention of Senators to it. It gives all the facts in connection with the matter and the reasons which led the committee to the conclusion at which they arrived.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report as requested.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 124, Sixty-third Congress, first session.]

LIMITING EXPENDITURES FOR TELEGRAMS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, submitted the following report (to accompany S. Res. 156):

The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution (S. Res. 156) limiting expenditures for telegrams sent or received by Senators, having considered same, recommend that the resolution do pass.

In the bills for a period of three months we find that the average for each Senator was 45 telegrams and the average cost $26.27. The highest number sent by one Senator in that time was 313, and the highest cost $210. The lowest cost for any Senator who sent any telegrams at all was 26 cents. Nine Senators sent none at all. The total number sent during the period was 4,372, and the total cost was $2,522.13.

Some Senators seem to have substituted the telegraph for the post. Some seem never to resort to it. Others have resorted to it only on strictly official business, and then only when the occasion was emergent and a letter could not answer the purpose. All sorts of ideas seem to prevail among Senators as to what constitutes "official business." Here a Senator discloses, judging from the contents of his telegrams, that anything not private must be official; here another that legislative business of the Senate alone is official. Some telegrams are in cipher.

The system is unequal, confused, undefined, and undefinable—has a tendency to furnish material some day for the muckraker—has no legal footing upon any statute—is based on a custom which has grown by analogy to the franking privilege, and the cost is borne out of the contingent fund of the two Houses. We are informed that the same chaos and inability to bring order out of it exists in the House of Representatives.

The contract between the telegraph companies and the Sergeant at Arms provides solely for "official business." The companies take the position that they can not determine what is official business and must leave that in foro conscientiæ with each Senator. We do not see how they could well take any other position. We also see—can not fail to see—how Senators may, indeed must, disagree in their construction of the meaning of the contract.

The system started in the year 1897 under arrangements made by the Sergeant at Arms with the telegraph companies. We have found no resolution of the Senate authorizing its inauguration. For years prior to 1897 the custom existed of paying at postal rates fixed by the Postmaster General for telegrams sent by the Sergeant at Arms and the Secretary of the Senate and chairmen of committees on official business of the Senate or of the committees.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Colorado will permit me, in justice to the late Sergeant at Arms, Mr. Bright, who was then in office when this arrangement was made, I wish to say that at that time I was acting chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and it was submitted to the committee and the committee agreed that this arrangement might be made. I want that to go in the RECORD, so that there might be no reflection on the late Sergeant at Arms, who was a very conscientious official, and who individually made this contract.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to reaffirm what the Senator from New Hampshire has just said. I learned it after the report was drawn up. I got a letter from Mr. Bright to that effect. He stated that it was done under the authority of the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly it was.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the committee seems never to have passed any formal resolution; at any rate we could find none.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to say that in the presentation of this resolution I do not want to reflect upon the Sergeant at Arms or anyone else. Under the authority which seemed to exist Senators sent telegrams, and I can readily see from every telegram that I have inspected that a Senator, under a liberal latitude which he himself could form, would consider it an official telegram. I have found, so far as I am concerned, none to which I could not give that view from the standpoint of a liberal interpretation of what they understood were their rights. Consequently this resolution was not introduced for the purpose of reflecting upon anyone who may have sent telegrams in excess of what other Senators sent, but the presentation of the matter to the committee was such that there was too great a difference between the use of the telegraph by some Senators and others. It was hardly fair to Senators themselves that the practice should continue without limit, because some Senators would regard that a telegram was not official and would not send it in this way, while another Senator would conclude that a similar telegram was official and would send it. The result was that we thought, in order to have a fair and somewhat equal rule among Senators, we ought to agree upon an amount. We had a conference with the appropriate committee—the Committee on Accounts, of the House—and they suggested the amount of $40 per annum, I believe. Believing, however, that this was a matter which should be controlled by each body, according to the views of each body, we felt that it ought to be $60 per year.

The very fact that some Senators do not use the telegraph at all on business that anyone could even suggest was not official leads to the conclusion and makes the difference between these telegrams to a large extent. For that reason we have felt that there ought to be some limit placed, so that if a Senator sent more telegrams than amounted to $60 a year he should pay for the excess number himself.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to say that I, too, have served on the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and during my service there we had occasion sometimes to charge back and collect from Senators where they had in our judgment overdrawn the amount which we felt should be credited, or had sent messages not properly classed as official. The Senator from Colorado will recognize, as the Senate itself will, that a Senator who lives within a few hours of his constituents can hardly be benefited by the use or his constituents can hardly receive the benefit from the use of the telegraph, while one who lives several days' distance finds it necessary to do considerable telegraphing, time being the live issue and the essence in many matters. Of course telegraphing long distances entails larger expense.

When the Senator from Colorado shall have concluded I desire to offer an amendment, not to oppose the movement that is proposed, but to make the proposition still more equitable.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state, Mr. President, that there is some difference in the two cases, but not such a great difference as was indicated by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. The telegrams sent in an area probably 300 or 400 miles, or it may be 600 miles from Washington, cost, I think, about 1 cent a word for 20 words, and then 1 cent a word thereafter. If you send fewer than 20 words the telegram will be 20 cents. As you go farther west the rate is increased a little. The rate to Denver is 1½ cents, I think—perhaps it is 2 cents, but my impression is that it is 1½ cents—a word for 20 words, which would be 30 cents. To California the rate is a little higher. Of course, there are inequalities, as there are bound to be in the framing of a general average, but no more than exist between the number of telegrams that will be sought from a constituency like New York, with 7,000,000 people, and one like Wyoming, which has 200,000 people. Consequently they offset each other to some extent. So it seems to me that to strike an average is better and fairer than to divide the United States up into sections, by which we would have different rates and amounts allowed to different Senators.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator from Colorado permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I want to ask whether, as a matter of fact, the Senate has a contract with the telegraph companies, or any arrangement with the telegraph companies, by which a Government rate only is charged on telegrams that may be sent on public business, no matter whether they are sent at the expense of the Senate or at the expense of the individual Senator?

Mr. SHAFROTH. My recollection is, though I have not looked at the particular provision, that when the Union Pacific Railroad Co. was incorporated and wanted a right of way over the public lands of the United States for the erection of telegraph poles, there was inserted a provision that there should be a Government rate. They have adhered to that, and the other telegraph company has met the competition by giving a similar rate.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. What I was trying to get at was this: The Senator from Colorado said one Senator, I think, had $210——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Two hundred and ten dollars.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. He might have had $210 of telegrams on public business, and I assume, of course, they were on real public business, in the strict acceptation of the term. The point to which I wished to direct the Senator's attention was that if the Senate paid $60 of that telegraph bill, whether the balance of the telegrams would be sent under the Government rate—which, as the Senator says, is about a cent a word—or whether they would be sent under the general commercial rate, which is very much higher? I ask this question for information only.

Mr. WILLIAMS. These telegrams are sent under the Government rate, but they are charged to the contingent expenses of the Senate.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The contract is that when they are marked by the Senator "official business" they shall receive the Government rate. We wish to correct the inequalities in that respect. If we limit it to $60 a year, then each Senator when he goes above that amount would have to pay at the general rates, of course, for whatever telegrams he sent.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Even though they were on public business?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Even though they were upon official business. There, again, if the Senator will pardon me, the wording of the contract is "official business," not "public business."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Well, "official business."

Mr. WILLIAMS. And if the Senator will pardon me again, the trouble is not so much in a direct violation of the contract, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] has said. There are very few telegrams, if any, which are sent by Senators that, under some construction, might not be considered public, official business. One Senator, and a very good lawyer, took the position, in discussing the matter with me, that he regarded anything as official business to be sent by telegram which could be franked if mailed. The abuse is not so much in that way; but the abuse is in this mainly, that where a Senator could have used the mail equally well, he uses the telegraph at the public expense. It would have cost the Government only 2 cents if he had used a letter, whereas his telegram would cost from 30 cents to whatever it would cost when he used his telegram. So that there was the abuse of the privilege under the law of unnecessarily using the telegraph system in substitution for the mail.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I have no idea what my telegraph bill may have been before the committee, though I doubt if in any year since I have been here I have equaled the amount proposed in this resolution. I know, however, that other Senators find the necessity of using the telegraph more frequently. It occurred to me that some way might be devised as to this public business, which is a personal expenditure to the Senator, so that if the Senator was impelled to send this official business at his own expense it should be at the minimum cost; in other words, that he should be allowed Government rates for the transmission of public official business over the telegraph, so that if a Senator should find it necessary to send $100 worth of absolute, straight, official business telegrams, $60 of the amount would be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate and $40 would be paid by the Senator; or, on the other hand, if telegrams costing $100 should be sent, and those on official business should cost $60, if the Senator were charged for the entire bill they might cost him $100 as an individual.

Mr. WARREN. If my colleague will yield to me for a moment, I wish to read to the Senator in charge of the bill what I think would be an amendment which would cover this case, and then offer my explanation of it. I would add to the resolution the following:

Any excess of this amount shall be charged to and paid for by Senators.

My experience has not been large—I speak of the time when I served as a member of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate—but when we charged back to Senators and collected from them the excess we were only charged the Government rate. I think now, if the measure should pass with that amendment, that those who exceeded the $60 limit would still have the benefit of the Government rate; and I feel as if this were worth trying.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that he add the words "the amount in excess of $60 to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate," so that Senators will not pay direct to the telegraph company, and the accounts will be kept in the contingent fund.

Mr. WARREN. That is what I intended, and I think the language covers it. If it does not, I am willing that it should. For instance, in postage I have very often——

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the exact language of the Senator's proposed amendment?

Mr. WARREN. In a moment. I very often have to pay for extra postage, which has been charged along during the month. That, of course, I know nothing of until the bill comes in. I think in this case, if the Senate pays for these dispatches from the contingent fund, the moment that the $60, or whatever may be the maximum amount, is exceeded, it should then be charged to and collected from Senators. I am of the opinion that that would be accepted by the company, and that it would greatly relieve those Senators who have a large constituency far away from the Capitol. It could not be abused, because, if it should be, the company would of course make complaint.

As to limit, I do not care whether it is $60, $75, $50, or $40.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I understand the Senator's proposed amendment, it is that the excess above $60 shall be charged back by the committee to the individual Senator?

Mr. WARREN. That the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate in control of the contingent fund shall collect it, and that the amount shall go into that fund.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator give me the exact language of his amendment.

Mr. WARREN. I have no pride in the language, but I will give the Senator what I have suggested, and he can put it into shape.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to say that the practical trouble about that is this: You might sometimes charge it back and not collect it.

Mr. WARREN. The accounts would be kept in the office where the amounts could be taken from the salaries of Senators.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the Senator might in the meanwhile have died or he might have left Congress, or he might have been defeated, or he might be a Senator who is not very solicitous about paying what he owes.

Mr. WARREN. I do not think that is a contingency the prospect of which the Senate could in a dignified way feel like indulging. The charges would only amount to a trifle and could, I feel sure, be easily collected, the same as postage is now collected. I want to say to the Senator in charge of the resolution that I had written the proposed amendment in this way, adding the words:

Any excess of this amount shall be charged to and paid for by Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, it seems to me that if we are so suspicious of ourselves we had better repeal any allowance to Senators for sending telegrams at all. That, it seems to me, will be much fairer than this method, because if we do have to send telegrams on official business and it is understood by your constituents that you have that privilege, you could spend your allowance of $5 a month, and when that was gone you would personally have to keep on paying additional amounts, although the payments in excess of $5 would be just as legitimate as the $5. If we can not trust ourselves to send telegrams upon official business, I would favor not allowing any money to be spent for this purpose; but if you are going to make an allowance for telegrams sent on official business, whatever amount is necessary ought to be paid for out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But can the Senator define what "official business" is?

Mr. BRYAN. I think so, and I would suggest this to the Senator——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have found about 12 different constructions regarding it amongst the lawyers of this body.

Mr. BRYAN. I think the proper body to define that is the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. It seems to me the telegram itself would show upon its face whether it was upon official business, and, if it did so show, it is perfectly right that the contingent fund should stand the expense. If it should fail to do so, then the Senator might be called on for an explanation; but I would infinitely prefer, Mr. President, to pay $5 a month myself than to say that I was unwilling to trust myself in the charging up of the expense to the contingent fund.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that some of these telegrams were in cipher. Aside from that, oftentimes you can not tell whether a telegram is on official business until you see either the telegram or the letter which called forth the telegram from a Senator. Not only that, but as to the telegrams which we examined, some members of the committee would say, "I think this should never have been sent as official business," while other Senators would say, "Yes; under a construction that I can see might be placed upon it, I think it is official business." So we would get into a question which is almost impossible of determination.

Mr. BRYAN. Then we had better abolish the whole thing, Mr. President.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I do not think so; but I think if you should take somewhere near the average number of telegrams that have been sent and allow each Senator that number that would be the fairest way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We would just be computing it like we do stationery.

Mr. BRYAN. I notice by the figures given in the committee report that the average for three months was $26.27 to each Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. About $8 a month.

Mr. BRYAN. That amounts to about $105 a year. I do not suppose the committee would say that the telegrams for which payment has been made out of the contingent fund to that extent were private telegrams; and therefore I have a right to assume that the official business telegrams amounted to $105 per Senator. Where is the justice, then, if telegrams are sent on official business, of saying that the Government shall pay for part of them and the individual Senator shall pay for the remainder?

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator should assume that the committee believed that this $105 average was all composed of telegrams sent on official business, because I do not believe anything of the kind.

Mr. BRYAN. I assume it, because the committee always did it, Mr. President, and I assume that the committee does its duty.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The assumption upon which that is based is that between the telegraph company and the Senate whatever is marked "official business" is a proper charge upon the part of the telegraph company; but as between the Senate and the particular individuals there might be a difference. To determine that as to each telegram would probably take weeks and months, and then there would be a difference of opinion with respect to telegrams as to whether or not they were on official business.

Mr. BRYAN. Well, Mr. President, it seems to me that we ought either to pay for "official business" telegrams or we ought not to pay for them, and that we ought not to divide up the amount and say that the Government shall pay part and the individual Senator shall pay the remainder. I am willing to vote not to make any allowance whatsoever to Senators for telegrams, but I am not willing to vote for this resolution saying that we will pay a proportion of the amount to be so spent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. BRYAN. Let me ask the Senator a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the Senator one first.

Mr. BRYAN. I want to ask the Senator a question: If Senators can not determine what is "official business," and it is necessary to limit them in the expenses incurred, why do we allow all the departments of the Government to send telegrams and charge them up to the public funds and not pay the expense themselves?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think that bears on this particular question. That is provided for by law, and not by resolution of this body.

Mr. BRYAN. That does not affect the merits of the matter. If it is right in one place, it is right in the other; if it is wrong in one, it is wrong in the other.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That may be so, but it has nothing to do with the merits of this proposition. Now, the question I want to ask the Senator is this: He says that we ought to pay for whatever is official business, no matter how large the bill is and no matter how little it is, and that we ought not to pay for any telegram that is not official business, no matter how little, and so forth. That brings us to the question who is is going to determine whether it is official business. The telegraph company surely can not do so. If it attempted to do so, it would have to question Senators when they sent their telegrams. The committee can not always do it. If the Senator had been on the committee, as I have been, he would know that here will come a telegram, for example, addressed to John Smith at some place in Kansas, let us say, and the telegram says "Your wire received; all right." We do not know what evoked the telegram; we do not know anything about it.

Mr. BRYAN. Does not the committee have the telegrams to which Senators send replies?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, of course not. We can not demand of Senators——

Mr. BRYAN. But the company has copies of the messages.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We have the telegrams, but we have not the letters. Most telegrams are in reply to letters, and we can not demand of a Senator that he shall show us his letters to find out whether or not a telegram is official when it does not disclose upon its face whether or not it is official.

Mr. BRYAN. I believe the committee would be doing justice if it should make a requirement that each telegram shall show upon its face that it is official business, if such is the case.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then you would very largely increase the expense to the Government, because you would increase the length of the telegrams. We are doing nothing in this respect but what was done with stationery. Years and years ago the rule was——

Mr. BRYAN. Pardon me one minute; I have said what I intended to say. The Senator can make his own speech.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to call the Senator's attention to this fact—and if the Senator does not want it called to his attention I will call it to the attention of the Senate: We are doing nothing in this matter except what was done with regard to stationery. The original rule, when the Government was started, was that Senators and Representatives were allowed to have the stationery needed for their official business. After a while it was found that there was so much abuse of that privilege in one way or another, and so much difference of opinion about it, and so much inequality in connection with it, that a certain maximum was fixed above which this special arrangement does not go. At least, that is the rule in the House of Representatives.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I have been detained——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One word more before I sit down.

Mr. VARDAMAN. As I was about to say, I have been absent this morning on official business, and I did not hear the resolution read. In order that I may be informed about it, I ask that the Secretary may report the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the resolution is read I wish to conclude what I have to say, in one sentence.

So far as I am concerned, in response to a part of what the Senator from Florida has said, I do not think this system ought to exist at all. So far as my individual opinion goes, I know of no more reason why a Senator of the United States should send a telegram at the expense of the Government than why anybody else should. A Senator is getting paid for his work. He knows what accompanies his work as an incident. Telegraphing now and then is an incident to it. Writing a letter now and then is an incident to it. I can not justify either the franking privilege or the telegraph privilege upon any well-defined public principle.

So much, so far as that goes; but we do not want to interfere with that. The system has grown up, and we merely want to keep it from being abused. As I said before, the abuse is not so much in sending unofficial business marked "official" as it is in substituting the telegraph for the mail where it is unnecessary.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I only want to say that I heartily approve this resolution. I think it is a very good settlement of the controversy which we had here some time ago over these matters, and I sincerely hope it may be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer a substitute for the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the substitute.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That hereafter no telegrams, on official business or otherwise, shall be sent or received by Senators at the expense of the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is that an amendment to the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Senator from New Hampshire offers it as an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to hear it again.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the resolution reported on the calendar the Senator from New Hampshire proposes to insert the following words:

Resolved, That hereafter no telegrams, on official business or otherwise, shall be sent or received by Senators at the expense of the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. So far as I am individually concerned, I do not object to the amendment. I can not accept it, speaking for the committee, but I do not personally object to it.

Mr. ROOT. Let us accept it, speaking for the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I am willing to accept the amendment if other Senators do; but I have observed that there is a rather careless manner of handling the differences that naturally arise in the expenses of Senators in different parts of the country. It is easy for a man who lives a few miles from the city of Washington to say that he is against mileage and that he is against using the telegraph at the expense of the Government for official business; but when a man lives thousands of miles away from Washington naturally he has to go home from time to time, and naturally he has to do some telegraphing, because of the length of time it takes for letters to go back and forth, time often being, as I have said, the essence of importance in official matters; and it creates an unfairness as between Senators who are near by and those who are far away to follow this line of action. It means, if carried to its logical conclusion, that there shall be no mileage, no telegraph expense, no franking privilege, nor sundry other expenses. Now, I am perfectly willing to adopt it if it is the wish of the majority; but if we do so, I want attention drawn to the fact that it is unfair as between Senators from the different States.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I wish to add to what the Senator from Wyoming has said, that consistency will require that we here and now abolish the franking privilege, and also make provision for paying out of our own pockets the salaries of our secretaries and stenographers.

There is a vast amount of official business that every Member of this body is required to look after. Unless he can utilize the telegraph by the arrangement which has been made, and which, I understand, has been in force for a number of years, especially when his constituency or some member of it insists upon an immediate reply, but must send the message at his own expense, if at all, then, to be consistent, we should also pay for official correspondence the postage which every other citizen is required to pay for private correspondence and which we pay for private correspondence. If the fact that we receive a certain emolument here should entitle the people of the country, without charge, to our services with reference to everything else, then let us go a step farther. Let us do away with the clerks and stenographers whose aid is absolutely indispensable on account of the vast amount of business which falls upon the shoulders of every Senator here and limit ourselves simply to the compensation given by the statute.

So far as I am concerned, I think on all official business the contract which has been made by the Sergeant at Arms should stand, either to the extent to which it has heretofore prevailed, leaving it to each Senator to determine what is and what is not official business—and I do not think that is subject to abuse—or else we should place a limitation upon it, either that reported by the committee or something else. If, however, we are going to adopt the substitute, let us also do away with the allowance for stationery which we enjoy at present, and let us strip ourselves of all these other things, and be done with it.

If we are going to be consistent, let us do that. If we are not going to be consistent, then why should we make an exception here because of fear, either of muckrakers or of somebody else?

I think the business of the Senate and the business of Senators can be better expedited, and their constituents will approve it, if they can obtain as swift communication as possible as to matters which affect their immediate interests, and about which they are constantly writing and telegraphing.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not think the question involved is whether we are to pay, as in postage, what the other citizens of the country pay. The question is, Whether we are to have, in the legislative branch of the Government, the same privileges which are accorded to the other branches of the Government?

The other branches of the Government do all their official business by mail under a frank, and they do all their telegraphing at Government rates, and it does not cost them, individually, anything. There is necessarily a great deal of purely Government business which we have to do by telegraph—I mean, in the aggregate. I am not speaking of one Senator or another.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts will pardon me, I do not think his analogy between the individual Senator's telegrams and those of the executive departments is quite well drawn. Originally, before this system began, a system existed which was in strict analogy with the privileges of the executive departments. That was that all telegrams relating to the business of the Senate had this privilege, whether sent by the Sergeant at Arms or whether sent by the Secretary or whether sent by the President of the Senate or whether sent by a chairman of a committee.

I just throw that out as a suggestion. I think it is better to have this system than to have that, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, every individual Senator has communications connected solely with the Senate to which he has to make reply, sometimes by letter and very frequently by telegram. If a hearing is to be held, and he gets a telegram from a constituent who thinks it is of the greatest importance for him to be present at the hearing, and a letter would not reach the constituent in time, he sends a telegram. It is as purely Government business as anything that is done by the departments.

I do not believe in what has been proposed here, that we should put a limitation on the amount and then secure to ourselves the right to send at Government rates messages for which the Government does not pay. It is very proper that there should be a Government rate for Government business, for which the Government pays; but if we are going to pay for telegrams out of our own pockets there is no reason why we should have a Government rate.

I agree with the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN]. Either the Senate can be trusted to say what is official business and not abuse the privilege, or it should be taken from the Senate altogether. If Senators are not fit to be trusted with it, they are not fit to be trusted with it under $60.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, having offered the substitute, I desire to say a word.

I have been scrupulously careful about charging to the Government only telegrams that I have sent on strictly official business, and I have also tried to be scrupulously careful as to the use of the franking privilege. Perhaps I have erred sometimes, but I am not conscious of it. It has cost the Government very little for the telegrams I have sent. If we are permitted a $60 latitude, I am afraid some of us may be tempted to send more than we do under existing circumstances.

I really do not think this matter amounts to much. This is the second or third time during the present Congress that the Senate has been investigating matters connected with itself, leading the country to believe that we are doing something wrong. This is so inconsequential a thing that I think we had better get rid of it.

I do not agree with the Senator from Wyoming that there is a discrimination here. There is a discrimination against those of us who live near Washington in the matter of mileage, but we are not finding fault about it. Again, so far as the franking privilege is concerned, that is established by law, while this is a mere agreement between the Sergeant at Arms and the telegraph company.

My position is exactly what the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Massachusetts have stated, which is that we must either trust ourselves in this matter, or we had better get rid of it entirely, and not haggle about it. So I hope the substitute I offer will be agreed to. That will get rid of one controverted matter, at least, and will allow the Senate to go along with its business without wasting time in inquiring into the acts of individual Senators or the Senate as a body.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, before he takes his seat, the very object of this resolution is to keep from having to inquire into the acts of individual Senators.

Mr. GALLINGER. Doubtless the Senator is right on that point, but we will forever get rid of the matter by adopting the substitute.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the very object of it. We do not want to go into any little petty washing of underclothes in connection with this matter.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the view of some Senators seems to be that since the amount is small it is of no consequence, regardless of the character of the act.

Senators have very widely different views as to what is a proper charge and what is an improper charge; as to what is official business and what is not official business. It never has been difficult for me to determine what I thought was official business, but other men who are just as honest as I am have different views as to whether or not a certain telegram should be charged to the Government. It is a question of opinion.

I do not believe telegrams relating to political appointments ought to be charged to the public. If I am communicating with some man in Kansas who wants an appointment and who wants my indorsement, I think that is a question between him and me, in which the Government of the United States has no concern so far as paying the expense of the communication is concerned. Others hold that since the Senate has to pass upon an appointment, any communication relating to the appointment is official business.

I do not think so. Other Senators think it is. Probably a majority of the Senate would decide that it was. There are telegrams of other characters that are sent at public expense, and in considering what should and what should not be charged to the Government the committee had different views. Some telegrams have been sent at the expense of the Government that the committee all agreed were not official.

The final result was that we thought this incidental expense to which Senators are put might be placed upon the same basis as stationery. I think it is altogether far-fetched when Senators insist that we are accusing each other of dishonesty when we undertake to apply to telegrams the same rule that our predecessors have applied to stationery.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The stationery allowance is provided by law, is it not?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; and why should not this allowance be provided by law?

Mr. GALLINGER. The measure before us does not propose to make a law in regard to it. It is a mere resolution of the Senate.

Mr. BRISTOW. It will be a law so far as we are concerned. It will be binding on us.

I can not see any objection myself to the limitation of $60. I think it is more than it ought to be. I understand that the limitation would bear more heavily upon Senators living in the far West than upon others.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment at that point?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Numbers go a good way toward equalizing distance. The Senator from New York has 10,000,000 people in his State. In the aggregate they naturally have a larger body of business than a State which has perhaps 500,000 inhabitants. So, one thing largely balances the other. If you have five telegrams from one State and one from another, and the one costs $2.50 and the other five cost 50 cents apiece, they balance.

Mr. BRISTOW. A comparison between Delaware and California would not be as apt as that between New York and Arizona, we will say.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I am one of the Members of this body who live a long ways off. It costs a good deal more for a single telegram sent by me to my constituents than it does the Senator from New York, for example. I do not know how much money of the Government I have expended in sending telegrams, but I should be greatly surprised to find that I had spent anything like $60 in a year. Certainly if the committee should find that I had sent telegrams that ought not to be sent under the rules they would do me a kindness to let me know, so that I might avoid anything of that kind in the future and meet the obligation of that one. I am not disposed to take advantage of the fact that I live in California instead of New York. I rather congratulate myself on that fact.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 2860.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2860) providing a temporary method of conducting the nomination and election of United States Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, beginning at line 19, with the word "candidates," strike out all the bill down to and including the word "State," in line 1, page 3, and insert the following words in lieu:

Provided, That if the manner of such nomination or election is not applicable to the case of a nomination or election by the people of the entire State, the laws respecting the manner of nominating or electing the governor shall be followed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bradley	Lane	Perkins	Sterling
Bristow	Lea, Tenn.	Reed	Sutherland
Bryan	Lee, Md.	Saulsbury	Swanson
Burton	Lippitt	Shafroth	Thomas
Chamberlain	Lodge	Sheppard	Thompson
Chilton	McCumber	Sherman	Vardaman
Clapp	Martin, Va.	Shields	Walsh
Clark, Wyo.	Martine, N. J.	Shively	Warren
Dillingham	Myers	Simmons	Weeks
du Pont	Newlands	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Gallinger	Norris	Smith, Md.	Works
Hollis	Oliver	Smith, Mich.
Johnson	Page	Smoot

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. CULBERSON], and to state that he is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. This announcement will stand for the day.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] on official business. He is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

Mr. REED. I announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. STONE]. He is absent on account of sickness. I make this announcement generally for the day. I was requested also to state that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is absent from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the discussion upon this amendment was had some three or four weeks ago, and it probably has been lost sight of, if any attention was paid to it at the time. I desire very briefly to restate the reasons why I offer the amendment.

The bill as it is reported from the committee in section 2 provides—

That in any State wherein a United States Senator is hereafter to be elected either at a general election or at any special election called by the executive authority thereof to fill a vacancy, until or unless otherwise specially provided by the legislature thereof, the nomination of candidates for such office shall be made, the election to fill the same conducted, and the result thereof determined, as near as may be, in accordance with the laws of such State regulating the nomination and election of candidate for Members at Large of the National House of Representatives.

I stop there for the purpose of pointing out the application of the first part of the amendment which I propose.

It will be seen that it is proposed by the bill as it now reads that the laws of the State in reference to the nomination of candidates for Members at Large of the National House of Representatives shall be adopted as the rule for nominating United States Senators. The objection to that is that in many of the States the language of the statute will not apply to the election of a Member at Large of the National House of Representatives, but it will apply to the election of Representatives in Congress who are generally elected by districts. In many of the States of the Union there is no express provision made for nominating Members at Large. So I have proposed by my amendment to strike out the words "candidates for Members at Large of the National House of Representatives" and insert in lieu of it the words "Representatives in Congress."

That will apply so far as the time and places of electing Senators is concerned in every instance. The time when a Representative is elected, whether by a district or by the State at large, will always be the same so far as the election of a Senator is concerned. So the places will always be the same. The places will be the ordinary election districts of the State, and whether they are designated in a law which provides for the election of Representatives by districts or Representatives of the State at large the places where the election shall be held will always be the same.

The only confusion which could ever arise would be with reference to the manner of nominating or of holding the election. I think the question could perhaps never arise in connection with the manner of electing, but it might arise in connection with the manner of nominating a Senator. In order to obviate that in the present bill there is the proviso:

Provided, That in case no provision is made in any State for the case of the nomination or election of Representatives at Large, the procedure shall be in accordance with the laws of such State respecting the ordinary executive and administrative officers thereof who are elected by the vote of the people of the entire State.

The objection to that is twofold. First, that in some of the States there will be found undoubtedly different provisions with reference to the election of different executive and administrative officers. For example, the secretary of state may be elected in one way, and the auditor, if there be such an officer, or the treasurer may be elected in a wholly different way, so that confusion would arise by providing for adopting the law respecting the ordinary executive and administrative officers. If we were to particularize some officer as the secretary of state, the attorney general, or some one else, that element of confusion would not exist.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER. I will ask the Senator why it would not answer the purpose to simply provide that the candidates for Senator should be nominated in the same manner as is provided for nominating candidates for governor of the State, and specify the governor. All the States elect their governors by a vote of the people. They are placed in nomination in some way in every State. Why not simply provide that the candidate for Senator shall be nominated and elected in the same manner as the candidate for governor?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That seems at first blush a very obvious method, but the difficulty is that the bill provides not only for general elections, but for special elections as well, and no special elections are held in any State, so far as I know, for a governor. The governor is elected for a term, and if his office becomes vacant during that time it is filled automatically by another officer—in most States, perhaps, by a lieutenant governor—who at once takes his place. So if you provide that a Senator shall be elected in the same way and at the same time and place as the governor, we would only cover the case of the general election and would not cover the case of a special election.

Mr. OLIVER. But——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will pardon me a moment further—if we adopt as a general rule what I propose, relating to the election of Representatives in Congress, then we will cover both cases, because whenever a vacancy occurs in the office of a Representative in Congress a special election is held. The laws of all the States provide for a special election, but that is not the case with reference to any other officer. In the case of the other officers of the States generally, the provision is that when a vacancy occurs in one of those offices it is filled by appointment and not by election.

Mr. OLIVER. In all States Representatives in Congress are elected by districts. In a few States they have Members at Large, but in some States they have a method of nominating Representatives in Congress by districts and another method of nominating candidates for State offices. This law would compel a State which has no provisions for a State-wide primary to provide for a State-wide primary for the single office of Senator, when we have no provision for doing it and no machinery by which they may do it. In our State we nominate all officers in a State-wide primary, but in certain other States they nominate Members of Congress by a primary, while they nominate their State officers by means of State conventions. In those States I think it nothing but right that Senators should be nominated in the same way in which they nominate their other State officers.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will listen to me when I discuss the next point, he will get the reply to what he has just now suggested.

I have already stated, and I will repeat briefly, in reply to the Senator, what I have already said. The Representative in Congress is provided for in every State in the Union by statute, but generally the statute is framed so as to apply to a Representative elected in a district and not to Representatives elected at large. Notwithstanding that, no difficulty can possibly arise with reference to the place and the time of electing United States Senators, because the places which are prescribed in the law of the State for the election of Representatives by districts will be the same places where Senators must be elected, and the time when Representatives must be elected will be the same time. The only possible difficulty will arise in connection with the manner of electing. That may be different, and the proviso as I have attempted to amend it in my proposed amendment covers that phase of the difficulty.

The second objection to the proviso in the bill as reported, where the law with reference to the election of the ordinary executive and administrative officers is adopted, is that there will be no law which will cover the case of a special election in many States, because the ordinary provision of the State statute is that when a vacancy occurs in the office of secretary of state or auditor or any other of the State executive or administrative officers the vacancy is filled by appointment of the governor and no special election could be held. So, whenever we come up against a law of that kind we will meet the difficulty.

A special election for United States Senator could not be held because there will be no law in the State which covers the case of the special election of an executive or an administrative officer, and having adopted that plan there will be no law under which we can elect a Senator at a special election.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will permit me, I simply want to suggest that that is exactly the case in my State.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is the case in my State.

Mr. GRONNA. The governor has no authority to call an election. The legislature has the power to call the election. Of course, so far as it applies to State officers, if there is a vacancy in the office of governor the lieutenant governor takes the place of the governor, and if there are vacancies among other State officers they are filled by the governor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is the case in my State, and it is the case in perhaps a majority of the States in the Union.

Now, those are the objections which occur to me as pertinent to be made to the bill as it is proposed. I propose to remedy that, as I have already stated, by putting in the place of the candidates for Members at Large of the National House of Representatives simply the provision "Representatives in Congress." As I said, that will take care of the elements of time and place under all conceivable circumstances, and there never can be confusion with reference to those two elements of an election. The only remaining element of any election is the manner, and in order to take care of that I have substituted in my amendment for the proviso contained in the bill the provision:

Provided, That if the manner of such nomination—

Confining it to the manner—

or election is not applicable to the case of a nomination or election by the people of the entire State, the laws respecting the manner of nominating or electing the governor shall be followed.

You see the manner of electing the governor will be applicable both to a general election and to a special election, and the fact that no special election is ever held for governor will make no difference, because we are not adopting the statute with reference to the time of electing the governor, which would result in confusion, but only adopting the statute of the State with reference to the manner of his election.

Mr. GRONNA. That applies only as to election.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It applies to the nomination and election. Whenever a case arises under the law of the State when the manner of nominating or electing Representatives would not be applicable to an election by the people or nomination by the people of the entire State, then we shall follow the manner of nominating or electing a governor, and by dovetailing those various provisions, so to speak, as I have done, it seems to me we will eliminate all elements of confusion. But if we do not do that, if we pass the bill as it is reported, I fear that a good deal of confusion will result.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. I remember when this bill was previously under discussion the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], who is not now present in the Chamber, suggested that it only provided for nominations, and did not cover cases where one might desire to become a candidate without being nominated, as, for example, an independent candidate. The Senator from Utah may remember that at that time I suggested an amendment that might probably cover that phase of the matter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; that amendment is pending; and I will say to the Senator that I think it ought to be adopted. I shall vote in favor of it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I was simply going to remark that I should like very much to participate in this discussion if I could, but I am utterly unable to hear what is being said by the Senators who are conducting it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There is only one of two ways of having the Senator from Montana participate in the debate, and that is either for Senators on this side to raise their voices when speaking or for the Senators upon that side to come over here.

Mr. President, I think that is all that I care to say upon the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I feel that perhaps too much time has already been taken up in the discussion as to which of these two systems ought to be adopted. I do not desire to say anything further upon the matter than to indicate for the benefit of those who may not have been here during the discussion heretofore that I do not think the substitute is calculated to remove any elements of uncertainty at all; in fact, I fear it will produce many. You will observe that it provides that the method shall be the same as that prescribed in the case of Representatives. If that is inapplicable, then the procedure with relation to the governor shall be followed. Of course that immediately precipitates a question as to whether the first is inapplicable. Some one will contend that in a certain State it is and some one will say that it is not. The officer will be troubled in starting the machinery in motion to determine whether or not it is applicable. He reaches a certain conclusion and is proceeding along the line that the procedure in relation to Representatives is applicable, and somebody else will say, "You are wrong about that," and will immediately institute proceedings to suppress that procedure and compel him to follow the other.

Again—and this is the particular objection I have to it—in many States there may be some specific provision in relation to the nomination of a governor, simply because of the peculiarities of that office, that would not be appropriate in connection with any other nomination. I want to have followed the general procedure that is laid down for the nomination of officers of the State generally. I have, however, said these things before.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I ask the Senator from Montana a question before he takes his seat? The difficulty which the Senator first suggested, of course, exists in the bill as it is reported. There is a proviso in the bill as reported that in the event no provision is made in the State for the case of the nomination or election of Representative at Large, then the other method shall be followed. Of course, that raises a question for determination as to whether the law of the State is applicable to the election of a Representative at Large.

Mr. WALSH. Well, hardly. If there is no provision at all in the statute for the case of the nomination and election of a Representative at Large, it ought to appear quite readily upon a mere examination. That would not be the case, however, when there is a provision there in relation to the nomination for Representatives in Congress; and the question arises as to whether you can make that particular machinery, intended primarily for the case of a district, applicable to the case of an entire State.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, it is a question of the degree of the difficulty. There is a question to be determined in either case. The Senator from Montana thinks it would be less difficult to determine whether the law provided for the election of a Representative at Large than to determine whether the law provided for the case of the nomination or election by the people of the entire State. However that may be, passing that difficulty and having determined under the existing law that the statute does not apply to the election of a Representative at Large, then does the Senator from Montana not agree with me that the law of the State with reference to the executive and administrative officers in the case of special elections will not apply where the provision is that such officers in case of vacancies shall be appointed and not elected? Certainly that case might arise.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Montana recognizes that, if there is no provision for a special election for any of those officers, there will be no provision for a special election for Senator; he recognizes that, as a matter of course. I might say with respect to that, however, that that is another objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah. Obviously there will be no provision in any State for a special election to fill a vacancy in the office of governor, because, so far as my knowledge goes, a vacancy in the office of governor is filled in no State by an election. So it does not in any way improve the matter. It is an unfortunate condition that may exist. There may be a law in some States for the nomination and election of some officer in the State by a special election. Obviously—at least apparently obviously—there is no law in any such State in the case of the governor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana is quite correct in saying that there would be no law providing for a special election for governor; I myself have already stated that. For that reason, I have carefully limited the proviso to the adoption of the manner of nominating or electing the governor, and have excluded from it the element of time and place. The manner would be the same for a special election as for a general election; the time and the place might be different. The time might be different, at any rate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

Mr. WALSH. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], who is detained from the Chamber by illness. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and vote "yea."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and vote "yea."

Mr. SHEPPARD (when the name of Mr. JAMES was called). I am authorized to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] and to state that he is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. This announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEA of Tennessee in the chair, when his name was called). The present occupant of the chair is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD], but he transfers that pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and votes "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. In his absence, I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. If he were present, my colleague would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SHIVELY. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. KERN]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY].

Mr. BRADLEY (after having voted in the affirmative). In view of that statement, being paired with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], I withdraw my vote.

So Mr. SUTHERLAND's amendment was rejected.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment: After the word "made," in line 16, insert "the mode of becoming a candidate determined."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 16, after the word "made," it is proposed to insert "the mode of becoming a candidate determined."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to hear briefly from the Senator from California what the difference is between the language offered by him and the language reported by the committee. What difference is there between "the nomination of candidates" and the mode by which candidates are determined?

Mr. WORKS. Well, Mr. President, in some of the States provision is made for becoming a candidate in other ways than by nomination; for instance, by petition, and otherwise becoming an independent candidate. That objection to the bill was suggested first by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and it occurred to me to be a valid one. It makes plain a matter about which there might be some question.

Mr. WALSH. My acquaintance with this matter leads me to recognize that as one method of making the nomination.

Mr. WORKS. Then, if that be so, Mr. President, the proposed amendment could do no harm at least.

Mr. WALSH. Out in our portion of the country it is very common to speak of "nomination by petition" or "nomination by convention" or "nomination by primary election."

Mr. WORKS. Those terms are used, I concede, but I suggest to the Senator from Montana that, in any event, the amendment could do no harm, and I think it may make clear what otherwise there might be some doubt about.

Mr. WALSH. I should fully agree with the Senator, but the language recurs in various places. If you go on a little further down you meet again the subject of nominations, for instance—

That in case no provision is made in any State for the case of the nomination or election of Representatives at Large—

You would be obliged also to change the language there.

Mr. WORKS. That would not affect the proposed amendment, as it relates to a law governing the question.

Mr. WALSH. I am sure it would. If the language above is not adequate to meet the case suggested by the Senator from California, the language below is not. I feel satisfied that the present language covers the case.

Mr. WORKS. Well, Mr. President, it is a matter of entire indifference to me, if the Senator is satisfied with the language of his bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 15, after the word "thereof," it is proposed to strike out "the nomination of candidates for such office shall be made"; in line 16, after the word "same," to insert the words "shall be"; and in line 17, after the word "determined," to strike out "as near as may be in accordance with the laws of such State regulating the nomination and election of candidates for Members at Large of the National House of Representatives: Provided, That in case no provision is made in any State for the case of the nomination or election of Representatives at Large, the procedure shall be."

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, there is no opposition of which I know to the bill under consideration, so far as it provides a temporary method for the election of Senators, pending the enactment of proper provisions upon the subject by the several States to carry into effect the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution. I believe it ought to be passed, as there are a number of the States that have not yet acted in this matter, and in case of vacancies in them it will save confusion such as resulted in the Maryland and Alabama cases.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], which I favor, merely asks that the provisions in the second section of the bill, regulating the nomination of candidates for Senator, be stricken out. This amendment was not offered by the Senator from Georgia in opposition to primary elections; on the contrary, I understand he favors the making of nominations for public officers in that way, and in this I agree with him. The opposition to the provisions in this bill upon that subject is predicated upon the want of power in the Congress to legislate upon it; and further, if such power exists, the legislation is a wholly unnecessary interference with the internal and domestic affairs of the States and a bad precedent to establish.

The States have the power to regulate the manner of nominating candidates for office, and most of them have done so by statutes providing for primary elections for that purpose. It is peculiarly a matter for domestic and local regulation—the highest form of popular government—and the States should not be disturbed in their control of it.

I do not understand anyone to deny that Congress has the power to regulate the manner of holding elections of Representatives and Senators except as to the place of choosing Senators. There is no question but what the power is given by section 4, Article I, of the Constitution, and the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Ex parte Seibold, reported in One hundredth United States, and others approving it, has sustained legislation of that character.

What the amendment offered controverts is that this power includes that to regulate the nomination of candidates. When the debate first began upon this amendment I undertsood the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to take the position that the word "election," used in section 4, Article I, of the Constitution, included and embraced elections held for the purpose of nominating candidates—primary elections—as separate and distinct functions; but now I understand his insistence to be that the nomination of candidates is an integral part of the election of an officer, and for this reason it is within the power of Congress to regulate them.

This I understand to be concurred in by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. While I have the highest respect for the opinions of both of the distinguished Senators upon constitutional questions—or, for that matter, upon all other subjects—I can not agree with them in their present contentions. I am fully convinced that both contentions are unsound and untenable. I believe that regular elections and primary devices, whether in the form of a convention or primary election, are separate and distinct things, and that the Congress has no power to regulate the latter.

It has been said, and correctly so, that constitutional provisions must receive a liberal construction in order to carry out and accomplish the principles of government, because they do not undertake with minute precision like other instruments to define their meaning. But it is equally true that the cardinal rule in the construction of all instruments, constitutions as well as statutes and private contracts, is to give effect to the intention of the authorities and parties adopting, enacting, and making them. There are certain rules which are observed in ascertaining this intention. The words employed are to be taken in their natural and popular sense at the time when used, unless they are technical legal terms, when they are to be given their technical signification. The prior state of the law and the evil intended to be remedied are to be considered. The circumstances of contemporary history may be looked to, and the practical construction placed upon the provision in question by those whose duty it was to enforce it is also entitled to much weight, if generally acquiesced in for a long period of time.

Mr. Black, in his work on Constitutional Law, says:

Whether we are considering an agreement between parties, a statute, or a constitution, with a view to its interpretation, the thing we are to seek is the thought which it expresses.

In the case of Rector of Holy Trinity Church v. United States (143 U. S.) it is said:

It is a familiar rule that a thing may be within the letter of the statute and yet not within the statute, because not within its spirit nor within the intention of its makers. This has been often asserted, and the reports are full of cases illustrating its application. This is not substitution of the will of the judge for that of the legislator, for frequently words of general meaning are used in a statute, words broad enough to include an act in question and yet a consideration of the whole legislation, or of the circumstances surrounding its enactment, or of the absurd results which follow from giving such broad meaning to the words, makes it unreasonable to believe that the legislator intended to include the particular act.

And, again, applying the rule to that case it is said:

The construction invoked can not be accepted as correct. It is a case where there was presented a definite evil, in view of which the legislature used general terms with the purpose of reaching all phases of that evil, and therefore unexpectedly it is developed that the general language thus employed is broad enough to reach cases and acts which the whole history and life of the country affirm could not have been intentionally legislated against. It is the duty of the courts under those circumstances to say that, however broad the language of the statute may be, the act, although within the letter, is not within the intention of the legislature, and therefore can not be within the statute.

It has also been held that—

The occasion of the enactment of a law may always be referred to in interpreting and giving effect to it. The court should place itself in the situation of the legislature, ascertain the necessity and probable object of the statute, and then give such construction to the language used as to carry the intention of the legislature into effect so far as it can be ascertained from the terms of the statute itself. (People v. Supervisors of Columbia County, 43 N. Y., 130.)

And that—

Courts in construing a statute may with propriety recur to the history of the times when it was passed, and this is frequently necessary in order to ascertain the reasons as well as the meaning of particular provisions in it. (United States v. Union Pacific Railway, 91 U. S., 72, 23 L. Ed., 224.)

The rules of interpretation and construction announced in these cases are elementary and well established, and I do not think they will be controverted.

Mr. President, let us briefly refer to the origin and object of the provision empowering Congress to regulate the manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives and the history of the times when the Constitution was framed and adopted.

It is said by Mr. Madison that the suggestion to the members of the convention of this provision arose from the failure of some of the States to elect and send delegates to the Congress of the Federation, Rhode Island being a notable case of this neglect, as it had not been represented for a number of years previous to the meeting of the convention. The provision was vigorously opposed in the conventions of the States held to ratify the Constitution, and an amendment was proposed to limit in express terms the action of Congress to cases of neglect or refusal of a State to make proper provisions for congressional elections and was supported by a majority of the 13 States; but it was finally abandoned upon the ground of the great improbability of congressional interference so long as the States performed their duty in this respect.

When the Federal Constitution was formulated and adopted organized political parties had not come into existence in this country and the nomination of candidates for public office in any form was, of course, wholly unknown. It is true that after the Constitution was framed the country was divided upon certain great political principles and policies which yet largely control the two great parties of this day, and those advocating and opposing them were generally called Federalists and Anti-federalists; but instead of political parties as we now understand these organizations the people were followers of leaders or groups of leaders who advocated or opposed those principles. Washington was elected both times without opposition, and, of course, no such thing as party organization was used in his behalf.

The first nomination of candidates by parties occurred about 1800 and was done by caucus—those for State officers by members of the general assemblies and those for President and Vice President by Members of Congress. This method of nomination continued to be used in a somewhat irregular manner until 1828, when, having become extremely unpopular, it was abandoned.

The first convention, representative in form and much like those now in use, was held by the Anti-Masonic Party at Baltimore in September, 1831, in which 13 States participated and which made nominations for President and Vice President and issued an address to the people of the United States stating the principles and policies of the party. The other parties immediately adopted this mode of making nominations, and a Democratic convention was held in the same city in the succeeding May, when Andrew Jackson was nominated for a second term, and was the first President ever nominated by a convention composed of representatives chosen by the rank and file of the party.

The Democratic Party continued to make nominations in this way, and the national convention held by it in 1840 adopted the first formal political platform in the manner of our present conventions.

But complete party organization by the election of a national committee, with a chairman and secretary, and power to call conventions, and otherwise provide for the nomination of candidates and the making of platforms was not effected until 1848, when the Democratic Party was so organized.

Primary elections for the nomination of candidates, provided for by party organization and later by State legislation, came into use, as I understand, about 1880.

Congress from the adoption of the Constitution—if the construction of Article I, section 4, is sound—has had the power to regulate the manner of nominating candidates for Members of the House of Representatives in all particulars as it is now claimed it has the power to control the nomination of Senators, but it has never attempted to exercise such power, although candidates for seats in the lower House were for many years, and in some States are now, nominated by conventions, and great abuses have for years existed in the manner of holding and conducting both primaries and conventions for this purpose.

Mr. President, this brief history of the provision of the Constitution we are discussing and of the origin and evolution of the organization of political parties and party machinery, I think, will aid in ascertaining the extent of the power over elections which the framers of the Constitution intended to confer upon Congress.

I will now call attention to the language of the provision, for if it clearly expresses the meaning of the lawmakers all discussion of that question is precluded. Mr. Black, in his work on constitutional law, says that in ascertaining the intention of lawmakers—the first resort in all cases is the natural signification of the words employed in the order and grammatical arrangement in which the framers of the instrument have placed them. If, thus regarded, the words embody a definite meaning which involves no absurdity and no contradiction between different parts of the same writing, then that meaning apparent upon the face of the instrument is the one which alone we are at liberty to say was intended to be conveyed. In such a case there is no room for construction. That which the words declare is the meaning of the instrument, and neither courts nor legislatures have the right to add to or take away from that meaning.

It is provided that the Congress may regulate the manner of holding elections, and the extent of the power thus given seems to depend upon what was meant by the word or term "election." Whether it was used in its popular or technical sense is immaterial, because they are the same when used in connection with the choice of public officers. And when so used it means the performance by the people of the governmental function of choosing an officer to exercise certain powers which the law has conferred upon whomsoever may be elected to the office to be filled. If this definition of "election" is correct, and I do not think it can be controverted, it is conclusive of the meaning intended to be expressed. The members of the Constitutional Convention could not have used the word or term "election" in any other sense. Political parties had not then been formed and nominations for office in any form were unknown. It is absurd to say that things unknown could have been contemplated by those framing the fundamental law.

The popular meaning of the term then and now is an election of officers. We all know that when we speak of an election we mean an election of officers in which all qualified voters may participate. It was and is also the technical meaning of the term. It is so used in all State constitutions and all statutes regulating the election of officers. In a large majority of the cases decided by the courts of last resort of the States, referred to in the discussion of this bill on a former day, it is held that the term "election" refers to the election of officers, and that it does not include primary elections for the nomination of candidates for office unless so expressly stated. I will refer to these cases later in another connection. But I understand that it is not now insisted that Congress is authorized to provide for and regulate primary elections as a distinct function, and I will not further discuss the question.

The learned Senators, however, say that devices for the nomination of candidates for office are a part of the machinery of elections authorized to be held for the election of officers, and, assuming that this is true, proceed to make able arguments on the wisdom, yea the necessity, of Congress controlling them under its power to regulate the manner of holding elections in order to prevent fraud, preserve the integrity of this governmental function, and secure a fair expression of the will of the people.

I do not differ with them in regard to the flexibility of the Constitution and its adaptability to the ever-changing conditions of our country resulting from a higher civilization and the development of a greater Nation. These are among the qualities which makes it one of the greatest instruments ever conceived and framed by man and which will perhaps contribute more to sustain its influences and perpetuate constitutional government than any to be found in it. I have no quarrel with the authorities they quote upon this subject. They are elementary and familiar law.

But the adaptability and flexibility of the Constitution, however, does not permit the application of its provisions to subjects power over which has not been delegated to it by the States. It only authorizes the adoption of new means to enforce and execute the powers given required by changed conditions. The quotation made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] from Judge Story illustrates this. I read from page 3059 of the RECORD:

How, then, are we to interpret the language of the clause? The true answer is in such a manner, as consistently with the words, shall fully and completely effectuate the whole objects of it. If by one mode of interpretation the right must become shadowy and unsubstantial and without any remedial power adequate to the end, and by another mode it will attain its just end and secure its manifest purpose, it would seem upon principles of reasoning absolutely irresistible that the latter ought to prevail. No court of justice can be authorized so to construe any clause of the Constitution as to defeat its obvious ends when another construction, equally accordant with the words and sense thereof, will enforce and protect them.

And in section 432 it is said:

In the practical application of government, then, the public functionaries must be left at liberty to exercise the powers with which the people by the Constitution and laws have intrusted them. They must have a wide discretion as to the choice of means, and the only limitation upon that discretion would seem to be that the means are appropriate to the end.

Such is the effect of other authorities. A further illustration is that present conditions make it difficult to enforce laws to regulate interstate commerce in its relation to intrastate commerce, yet this does not authorize the Congress to enact laws to control the latter. The power to regulate interstate commerce, although it may be difficult to do so without regard to intrastate commerce, does not authorize the Congress to take charge of another subject over which it is given no power in the Constitution.

It is said by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that no trace can be found in the Constitution where it was intended that the Federal Government should be to any extent dependent upon the State governments for the execution of its provisions. I think he overlooked the fact that the elective franchise is entirely within the control of the legislatures of the several States, and that they have the sovereign power to fix the qualification of voters who shall elect Senators and Representatives. The Federal Government, for this reason, is entirely dependent upon the States for electors of Senators and Representatives, without which elections can not be held.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Would it interrupt the Senator if I should ask him a question?

Mr. SHIELDS. Not at all.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is now referring to the proposition that the States fix the qualifications of voters?

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. But there is, of course, an express provision in the Constitution which states that the qualifications of voters for State officers shall be the qualifications for voting for Federal officers. Now, suppose that were not in the Constitution at all.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand the qualifications of voters for Representatives, as prescribed in the old Constitution, to be those of voters for members of the most numerous branch of the general assembly of the State.

Mr. BORAH. That is precisely it. I say the National Constitution has provided that the qualifications of voters for Congressmen, and in this instance for Senators, shall be the same as the qualifications of voters for members of the most numerous branch of the legislatures of the respective States.

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. That is fixed in the fundamental law. Suppose, however, that provision were not in the law. Suppose the National Constitution had not written that proposition into the law. Would there be anything then to prevent the Congress from providing the qualifications for voters for the election of Federal officers?

Mr. SHIELDS. Why, certainly not, if we had no constitutional provision upon the subject, provided that power was delegated to the Congress.

Mr. BORAH. That was not a power which existed to delegate. At the time of the formation of the Constitution the voters had no right to cast votes for a Federal officer. There were no Federal officers to elect. They created another government and provided for electing officers. Now, it was not delegating a power which had belonged to the States theretofore to give them the power to fix the qualifications of voters for Federal officers, because that was not a right which belonged to the States, but in organizing a national government it became necessary to have voters in order to elect the elective officers, and the National Government simply adopted as its own the qualification which the States had fixed.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, it is not necessary to discuss the case of a law that is conceded not to exist, nor to suppose what the case would be if certain provisions were or were not in the Constitution. I do not agree with the Senator that the Federal Government merely adopts the State method of prescribing the qualification of voters. The power vested in the Federal Government is the specific power that the States vested in it by the Constitution. It gets all of its power and all of its authority in this matter from the Constitution and from the powers that the States, as distinct and independent sovereignties, surrendered to it and vested in it by that instrument.

Mr. BORAH. The States did not surrender to the National Government any right with reference to fixing the qualification of voters to vote for Federal officers, did they?

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly. There would have been no Federal officers had not the States surrendered to the Federal Government the power to elect them. All the sovereignty of the Federal Government comes from the States.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but here was a particular power, a particular right to cast a vote for Federal officers. That was not anything which belonged to the States prior to that time. We were creating a new Government, a Government which had to exist by virtue of elective officers, and the question arose as to who should be permitted to vote for those elective officers. The National Government said: "We will accept the qualifications which the State fixes"; but it might just as well have said: "We will fix the qualifications ourselves."

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator. The National Government did not have anything at all to say about it. There was no National Government when the Constitution was framed and adopted. It came into existence afterwards. The framers were the representatives of the States in the constitutional convention. It was the States speaking; and the States vested in the Federal Government they created the power to have Senators and Representatives as a part of that Government. The power to fix the qualifications of voters was a power always vested in the States, and they simply did not surrender that power to the National Government.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Suppose the Constitution had simply provided for a Congress, to consist of a Senate and House of Representatives, and had not prescribed who should vote for Representatives at all, or who should vote for Members of the Senate, but had omitted all reference to that subject. Then who would have regulated the election of the Members of the House of Representatives and of the Senate—the State or the General Government?

Mr. SHIELDS. It is hardly necessary to consider a question that supposes a different Constitution from that which we have.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think the answer of the Senator might reflect some light on the matter which he and the Senator from Idaho have been discussing.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have prepared myself in regard to the Constitution and the provisions that we find in it. I could not, of course, anticipate what some one suggests might have been placed in it or might have been left out of it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But I understand the Senator from Tennessee to be insisting that the States have delegated to the Federal Government whatever power it may have to regulate elections.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is my contention.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then the Senator must conclude that it was a power which originally belonged to the States.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think it was.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then the Senator's answer to my question, I take it, would be that the power to fix the qualification of voters, if there had been no reference at all to it in the Constitution, would have been in the States and not in the Federal Government.

Mr. SHIELDS. It might have been. As I have said, I have not considered the question, because I find in the Constitution an express provision in regard to the power to prescribe the qualifications remaining in the States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But if provision had been made in the Constitution for the officers of the Federal Government, and nothing more had been said about it, is it not a fact that the authority of the Federal Government to prescribe the manner in which those officers should be elected would have followed as a necessary incident, and it would not have belonged to the States?

Mr. SHIELDS. I think not, under our dual form of government.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Utah if he will kindly favor us with his own views as to where the power would rest, under those circumstances, to prescribe the qualifications of voters?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think if there had been no provision whatsoever upon the subject the Federal Government might have made its own provisions with reference to the qualification of voters.

Mr. WALSH. That is, Congress would have power to prescribe the qualifications?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Congress would have had power to do it in that event.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee further yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. A portion of section 2 of article 1 of the Constitution, with which the Senator from Tennessee is familiar, says:

> And the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

Now, the question arises if that power originally belonged to the States, if they could fix the qualifications of the voters, why was it necessary to have inserted in the National Constitution a stipulation that the National Government would accept that fixing? If, as the Senator contends, it was a power which belonged to the States, if they were to fix the qualifications of the voters without any provision, then absolute silence upon the part of the Constitution would have left that power in the States, and there was no necessity for this affirmative declaration.

The very fact that there was an affirmative declaration in which the National Government accepted this qualification showed that it was in the minds of the fathers that without affirmative acceptance the power would belong to the National Government. For that reason they simply said: "We will accept the qualification which the State has fixed and not undertake to fix a qualification of our own."

The Senator will find on examining the history of the time that it was one of the theories and one of the insistences of those who believed in State rights that that qualification should be accepted and that it should be affirmatively put in the Constitution, otherwise the National Government itself could fix the qualifications of every voter who would vote for a Federal officer. The affirmative action of the framers of the Constitution was for the purpose of settling in the minds of those who were jealous of that right that the National Government never should assume to fix that qualification or assume that power, and therefore they put it in the Constitution. Otherwise it would have belonged to the National Government.

Mr. SHIELDS. There are quite a number of provisions in the Federal Constitution that were placed there to prevent all question and all doubt as to the power that was delegated and to show the limitations that were placed on it, and there was no particular reason for this except the anxiety of the States not to surrender too much of their sovereignty and to have definitely stated that which they were surrendering or delegating to the National Government.

In my opinion an answer to all arguments of that kind is that all the powers of sovereignty were vested in the 13 States which adopted the Constitution. The Federal Government was their creature. It could have and could receive no powers except through their consent. All the powers Congress is now exercising under the Constitution are a part of the sovereign powers that the States had before that instrument was adopted.

Now, to go back to the point—the subject under discussion.

I also agree with them that under the power to regulate the manner of holding elections vested in Congress by section 4, Article I, Congress may legislate in regard to every step or act in the manner of holding an election for the choice of Senators and Representatives. I have never denied this. But their arguments are all aside from the questions presented in this discussion. They are all predicated upon the assumed premises that nominating devices are a part of the election authorized by law to elect Senators and Representatives; and their premises being unsound, as I will undertake to show, their whole argument falls to the ground.

An election is a governmental function provided by law for the choosing of officers to exercise certain powers which the law confers upon the particular office to be filled, in which all the people—or, rather, qualified voters of a particular State or subdivision of the State—have the right to participate. This is the concurring popular and technical meaning of the word "election" as used in all our constitutions and statutes, when not otherwise stated.

An election has been defined to be "the embodiment of the popular will; the expression of the sovereign power of the people. In common parlance, the act of casting and receiving the ballots, counting them, and making the return." (Cyclopedia, vol. 15, p. 279; Stinson v. Sweeney, 17 Nev., 309, 320; State v. Tucker, 54 Ala., 205, 210; Ex parte Conley, Tex. Cr. App., 75 S. W. R., 301.)

"A choice of persons for public offices." (Seaman v. Baughman, 82 Iowa, 216.)

I call attention with emphasis to the fact that it is for a public office and by the whole people.

In distinguishing an election from an appointment it is said that "the term 'election' carries with it the idea of a choice, in which all to be affected by the choice participate." (Cyclopedia, vol. 15, p. 279, and cases there cited.)

In other words, Mr. President, in electing an officer all the people participate and all are to be affected by the result of the election.

Congressional elections—that is, those held to elect Senators and Representatives, the manner of holding which Congress has the power to regulate—it must be kept in mind, are participated in by all the citizens of the State or congressional district, who, by the laws of the State, are qualified to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the general assembly of the particular State, without regard to their political and partisan affiliations, none of whom can be excluded by an act of Congress or of the State legislature. The voter in elections of this kind also exercises a right and governmental function as a citizen—the participation in naming an officer of the Federal Government—guaranteed to him by the Federal Constitution, for it provides that the voters qualified to vote for the most numerous branch of the assembly may vote for these officers.

The result of such election is final and binding upon everyone, and vests authority upon the person elected.

Such are the elements and such are the effects of an election in the sense the word is used in the constitutional provision we are considering.

How different in every respect is a convention or primary election. Both are included in this bill, for it speaks of the method of nominating and includes conventions and primary elections, whichever may be in force in any particular State. In the words I again read from the Cyclopedia of Law, volume 15, page 279: A primary election is "purely an election of political parties and associations as a means of selecting their candidates."

In Ledgerwood v. Pitts (122 Tenn.), a case involving the constitutionality of a primary law and which has heretofore been referred to in this debate, it is said:

> The first inquiry therefore presented for our examination is whether or not these provisions of the Constitution have any application at all to primary elections. Admittedly no such thing could have been in contemplation by the framers of the Constitution when they came to formulate the election and suffrage clauses of that instrument, for at that time no such thing as a primary election had ever been suggested. The object of this modern invention of political parties is primarily for the purpose of permitting and requiring the entire electorate of that party to participate in the nomination of candidates for political office. The plan is simply a substitution for the caucus or convention. It is true, as stated, it is a part of the political machinery that starts the candidate on his way, and the political party is thereby enabled to crystalize and concentrate its vote on that particular candidate who is chosen as the representative, and expositor possibly, of their political views, but the limitations and safeguards of the Constitution apply exclusively to the final election when the officer is chosen in the mode required by the Constitution.

The court in this opinion, in regard to the weight of authority on this question, says:

> The right of the legislature to require that nominations shall be by primary and to prescribe additional qualifications for the voters participating in the same has been recognized by the weight of authority in the States of the Union (Runge v. Anderson (100 Wis., 533); State ex rel. McCarthy v Moore (97 Minn., 308); State v. Drexel (74 Nebr., 770); Hopper v. Stack (69 N. J. Law, 335); Healey et al. v. Wipf (S. Dak., 117 N. W., 521); Griffin v. Gesner (78 Kans., 669); Walling v. Lansdon (15 Idaho, 282); State v. Nichols (50 Wash., 508).)

An examination of many of these cases has disclosed the fact that they are bottomed on two propositions, namely:

First. That such primaries are not in reality elections, but merely nominating devices; and Second. That they are valuable auxiliaries for the promotion of good government and are regulated by legislative enactment for the public welfare.

Mr. President, I believe these authorities clearly establish the proposition that nominating devices are no part of an election, but merely the machinery devised and used by political parties to obtain an expression of the will of the majority of the party holding it, in favor or against candidates who are asking the support of that party for office; mere devices to concentrate the members of the party on a particular candidate. They are not necessary to the holding of an election. The electors participating in them do not exercise or perform any right or function of government, but entirely a personal right, as a partisan or member of a political organization. They do not contribute to the purity or integrity of elections, nor is that the purpose for which they are held. They do not ascertain or express the will of the whole people or of all the voters entitled to vote for the officers to be elected, but only the members of a political party, composed of a part of the people, or voters, and all others are excluded from participating in them. The nominee may never be clothed with governmental authority or authorized to perform governmental functions. Nominations are not legally binding upon either candidates or voters. The candidate is not compelled to run or to cease running, and the voter may, in his discretion, vote for the nominee or against him.

All these distinctions, to my mind, clearly show that elections and nominating devices are entirely and distinct procedures, one being a governmental function for a governmental purpose and the other a political device for a party purpose, and that the latter is not included in or a part of the former. This proposition is supported by every adjudged case where this or an analogous question has been presented, except one decided by the Supreme Court of Illinois. All the other cases which were cited on a former day of this debate by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], when properly analyzed, recognized the soundness of this proposition and treat elections and nominating devices as separate and distinct matters.

These cases, while holding that primary elections are elections within the sense of that word as used in the constitution and laws of the States where decided, also hold and declare in effect that they are separate and independent functions and not a part and parcel of the regular election for the choice of officers.

The same thing is held in Hanna v. Young (84 Md., 184), where, in sustaining a primary law which was attacked because thought to be in conflict with a constitutional provision in regard to elections, the court, after quoting the provision relied upon, said:

> The power to enact a primary election law lies back of and beyond this provision and is not derived from it at all.

In the case of State v. Felton (77 Ohio Stat., 577) the primary-election law of that State was attacked because the qualifications of electors therein were different from those entitled to vote in constitutional elections. The court said:

> If this contention is sound, then every elector has the constitutional right to vote at the primary election of every party. If the election is one at which merely the candidates of a party are to be selected, it can not be an objection that electors who do not belong to that party are not permitted to take part. That was one of the evils that the legislation was intended to prevent, and, as to the test prescribed for determining an elector's partisanship, it is impossible to conceive of a political party without the possession by its members of some qualifications, and the test prescribed by the statute is the usual one and is not unreasonable.
> But a primary election held merely to name the candidates of a political party is not an election within the meaning of this section of the constitution. That section refers to an election of officers, and not the nomination of candidates.

And in cyclopedia, volume 15, page 332, it is said:

> Unless it is expressly made so, a general election law is not applicable to primary elections, which are merely creations of political parties and associations, and may be held at such times and places and on such terms and conditions as may seem fit. But the legislature may recognize the existence of political parties and, within reasonable limits, regulate the means by which partisan efforts shall be protected in exercising individual preferences for party candidates; and this is the general purpose of primary-election laws, which are designed to secure to individual voters a free expression of their will.

It is not designed to prevent fraud in elections or protect the electors while casting their votes or any other matter relating to or concerning an election of officers, the only matters which Congress has a right to regulate.

> While, independent of statutory authority, the courts have no inherent power to interfere in the management of purely party affairs, many abuses, such as "bulldozing," fraudulent "packing" of primaries, whereby the will of a majority of a political party is frequently defeated, have produced a general tendency to regulate primary elections by statute. A statute which provides that one who has voluntarily become a candidate for a party nomination at the primary election and has failed to secure it shall not have his name on the official ballot is neither obnoxious to the Constitution nor unreasonable, for he is still eligible to office, and the electors are at liberty to write his name on the ballot if he can induce them to do so.
> It has been held that an election of candidates to the position of nominees is not an election within the meaning of the Constitution, and therefore that a primary election law which makes no provision for leaving blank spaces on the ballots, to enable the voters to write in the names of persons of their choice, is not obnoxious to the Constitution.

To support this the author of the article cites a very large number of authorities, which upon examination I have found fully sustained the text.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] have referred to what is known as the enforcement act, enacted by Congress in 1870 and amended in 1871, authorizing the judges of the Federal courts to appoint supervisors of elections held for the purpose of electing Representatives in Congress, and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States sustaining it. The first case in which this legislation was sustained is Ex parte Seibold (100 U. S., 371), appealed from the circuit court of the United States sitting at Baltimore, Md.—in which Mr. Justice Field filed a vigorous dissent—which was approved in that of Ex parte Yarbrough (110 U. S., 661), appealed from the circuit court of the United States sitting at Atlanta, Ga., and in some other cases.

The principle settled in these cases is that the power of Congress arises because the function to be performed or the right to be exercised—voting for a Representative in Congress—is dependent on the laws of the United States. In other words, the court held that the Constitution gives the citizen who by the laws of his State is entitled to vote for members of the most numerous branch of its legislature the right to vote for a Representative in Congress, and in so voting the elector performs a function authorized by the Federal Constitution; therefore Congress may by legislation regulate the exercise of that right and function. This is all the courts have held in any case involving the question.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has laid much stress on the probability of Congress providing that in congressional elections the Australian ballot shall be used, and that this would make nominations a necessary part of elections. I think his fears of this matter are groundless, as will appear from a quotation from the cyclopedia, to be found on page 288 of volume 15.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. WALSH. Permit me to remark to the Senator from Tennessee that he must have very grievously misunderstood my remarks about the matter. I expressed no fear, no dread at all, of the enactment of any such law by Congress. I expressed no view about this matter at all. I merely addressed to the Senate the interrogatory as to whether Congress could pass such a law or not, and I should like——

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator has misunderstood me. I did not mean to say that he feared the passage of the law in the sense that he was opposed to its passage or favored it, but that if Congress should pass such a law, it would create such a complication as would make a primary or some sort of a party nomination necessary in order to hold an election.

Mr. WALSH. No, Mr. President——

Mr. SHIELDS. That is what I understood the Senator to say.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator still misunderstood the matter. I address to the Senator now the inquiry as to whether, in his judgment, Congress could pass a law providing that all elections for Senators and Representatives in the various States shall be by the Australian ballot system? In other words, the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November comes along, and can Congress say when you vote then you must vote in accordance with the Australian ballot system?

Mr. SHIELDS. Congress undoubtedly, under the construction of the article of the Constitution we are discussing, and as given in the cases of Seibold, Yarbrough, and others, to which I have referred, has the power to regulate the elections in which Senators and Representatives are to be elected, and doubtless that power would extend to prescribing the form of the ballot.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield further to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator has answered with entire frankness. I am sure he is answering the question in that spirit now. The only question that I proposed was when that is done how can you frame a law by Congress prescribing that the election shall be by the Australian ballot system unless in that law you make some provision for getting the nominations of the various parties upon the ballot.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the quotation from the cyclopedia which I was about to read fully answers the Senator's question, and I will now read it, because it is sustained by a number of adjudged cases from the several States. It is not a mere opinion of my own. The quotation is as follows:

> In general it may be said that the so-called Australian ballot acts, in the various forms in which they have been enacted in many of the States in this country, have been sustained by the courts. The distinguishing feature of this ballot system is that every elector shall be permitted to vote for whom he pleases by depositing a ticket bearing the names of the persons for whom he wishes to vote in a receptacle provided for the purpose in such a way as to secure to the elector the privilege of complete and inviolable secrecy in regard to the persons for whom he has voted. It is competent for legislatures to prescribe official ballots and prohibit the use of any other. They may also provide for printing on such ballots the names of candidates who are regularly nominated or who run as independents, provided the constitutional right of the voter to cast his ballot for the person of his choice is not violated.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. SHIELDS. Let me finish the quotation.

Mr. WALSH. Very well.

Mr. SHIELDS (reading):

But it is not within the power of the legislature to restrict electors in their choice of candidates or prohibit them from voting for persons whose names are not printed on the ballots. Nominations entitle the nominees to places upon the official ballots printed at public expense, but the voter is still at liberty to vote or paste on his ballot other names than those which may be printed there, and the statutes generally recognize this right by requiring blanks for such writing or pasting next to the printed names.

That is the way it could be done if the Australian ballot system should be adopted throughout the United States.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly. Mr. President, that is the procedure outlined in very terse and clear language; but likewise the authorities are quite uniform, indeed I believe universal, that notwithstanding the names of the candidates of the various parties are printed upon the ballot an opportunity still must be given to the voter to vote for any man whose name is not upon it if he cares to do so. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Australian ballot law must provide that the officer of the Government shall print the ballot and shall print upon the ballot the names of the various candidates of the various political parties, and in order to do that he must know who the candidates of the various political parties are, and it must lay down a rule by which the officer can tell whether, for example, the man's name that goes on the ballot as the candidate of the Democratic Party is the candidate of the Democratic Party. You must vest him with power in some way to determine that matter, must you not?

Mr. SHIELDS. Not necessarily, Mr. President, at all. There is no law and there can be no law compelling political parties to make nominations. Suppose they are in default, suppose all the parties refuse to make any nominations, then will there be no election? Certainly there will be, because I have just read from this authority that there must be blanks and there must be provision for pasting the names of other candidates.

Mr. WALSH. Unquestionably.

Mr. SHIELDS. All of them can come in that way. The law in regard to placing the names on the ballot also provides for cases where a nomination is made by a political party in certain cases, when a certain number of citizens petition that the name of a candidate shall be placed upon it; that is, that the officers holding the election shall place his name there. It is not a law requiring the candidate to be nominated. You can not make it imperative or a duty upon them, or one for which they can be punished; nor can you prohibit a man from running if he does not get a nomination and be certified to the officers holding the election.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield further to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. WALSH. There is no doubt in the world that if parties did not make a nomination the officer of the Government could not put their names upon the ballot, and all that he could do then would be, as a matter of course, to furnish blank ballots to the voter. There being no nominations, the voter would fill out the ballot as he saw fit.

That is not the question. The Australian ballot system contemplates that political parties will make the nominations, and likewise that the candidate of that political party is entitled to have his name on the ballot. The political party makes a nomination and the candidate comes to the officer of the Government and says, "I want my name printed upon this ballot as the candidate of the Democratic Party." What are you going to do about it? You have got to vest an officer with the power to determine whether he is the candidate of that party, have you not?

Mr. SHIELDS. I think I have answered that question, Mr. President. If all what the Senator says was granted, it would not make a political machine a governmental function.

I believe both upon authority and reason it must be held that elections and nominating devices are distinct and independent functions. I believe it must be held that elections are governmental functions and part of the machinery of the Government, while nominating devices are partisan political functions and part of the machinery of political parties.

It will not be asserted that conventions and primary elections held under the rules of party organizations, unauthorized and unprotected by laws, are part of the election machinery of this country.

It would be absurd to so treat such irregular proceedings, conducted by unsworn managers or officers having no authority from any branch of the Government. It must be conceded that these are mere devices of political parties. Now, the fact that they—that is, the nominating devices, primary elections, if you please, may be legalized and protected by law does not change their nature or make them part of an election. Such laws merely regulate a political function. They no more make a nominating device a part of the governmental election machinery than would the regulation of a gambling house by law—the stock exchange, for instance—make it a department of the Government.

Certainly, Mr. President, it must at least be admitted that the power of Congress to regulate the nomination of Senators and Representatives is not clear, and the conclusion that the power exists can only be reached by giving the provisions in question a forced construction not in contemplation when the Constitution was framed and adopted.

I believe a doubtful constitutional power should not be exercised, if at all, save in cases of great emergency. No such case is here presented. The bill merely provides that the State laws upon the subject of nominations shall apply and be enforced, and that will be done without any action upon the part of Congress. I believe we can safely intrust to the local governments the duty of holding fair conventions, of holding fair primaries, of seeing that the will of the people is reflected in nominations.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Am I correct in understanding that this bill only operates in States wherein there has been no provision for primary elections?

Mr. SHIELDS. No; the Senator is mistaken. It only operates where there are laws for primary elections, and provides that nominations shall be made according to those laws. The bill has no general or universal application. It may apply in one way in one State, in another State in a different way, and in still others not apply at all, because in about one-third of the States there are complete primary laws; in about one-third there are primary laws which partially regulate nominations, leaving it to the political parties to complete the plan for that purpose; and in a number of other States there are no laws at all upon the subject.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, the bill simply provides that where the State has provided for the nomination of a Senator the Senator shall be nominated in the manner and in the way provided by that State?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, no; the Senator is quite in error.

Mr. SHIELDS. It has no reference to primaries for the nomination of Senators under existing law, but it extends the existing laws for nominating other officers, if I understand it correctly, to the office of Senator. Of course the States had no laws on that subject before the seventeenth amendment was adopted.

Mr. BORAH. We have it correct now, that the laws of the several States for nominating State officers, and so forth, shall apply with reference to nominating Senators. So that, after all, we are simply extending the method and the manner which the States adopted with reference to their own officers, to Representatives, and to Senators.

Mr. SHIELDS. That has been stated.

Mr. BORAH. We are withdrawing very little power from the States. We are practically adopting the methods which they have seen fit to adopt with reference to nominating officers.

Mr. SHIELDS. That question has been adverted to by those who have spoken on both sides of this subject. This simply provides for the application, I believe, of the State laws to the election of Senators; but it is admitted by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and by others that if Congress has the power to provide that State laws shall be applied and followed in these nominations it has the power to enact a law for that purpose independent of the State laws. If it has one power it has both. It is the principle involved that is in controversy here. So far as my State is concerned it would have no effect at all, because we have no primary law, but we expect to have one enacted by our next general assembly.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, then, the objection to the bill on the part of the Senator from Tennessee is purely one of power—that we ought not to interfere with the policy in the several States at all—but the Senator is of the opinion that we have no power as a National Government to say that the State laws shall apply to Senators and Representatives.

Mr. SHIELDS. My position is that Congress has no right or power to legislate upon the subject in any way; that it is not a part of an election.

And now to return to the argument.

The provision, if enacted, will be a dead letter, because there is no method provided for its enforcement and no penalties provided for failure to comply with its mandate. Why go into this new field of legislation and exercise a doubtful power when there is no demand for the legislation and no good can come of it?

But if Congress had the power to control the nomination of Senators and Representatives, I do not think it should exercise it, especially as it has failed to do so for more than a century, and the power has in a manner become obsolete. It is an unnecessary interference in the local affairs of the people of the States and congressional districts. The States are all taking care of such matters. It is also contrary to the established policy and unbroken traditions of the Democratic Party.

The principles and faith of the Democratic Party as stated by Mr. Jefferson in his first inaugural address have never been departed from, but constantly reaffirmed by the leaders of the party and in platforms adopted by the national conventions from that day to the present. One of the greatest living Democrats has said:

Jefferson's first inaugural address contained the essence of the party creed as generally accepted during the first quarter of the nineteenth century. In fact, it is still the creed of the party, and no group of men desiring to maintain an influence in the party can even now admit any essential departure from it.

Among the principles announced in that address is—

That the support of the State governments in all their rights is the most competent administration for our domestic concerns and the surest bulwark against antirepublican tendencies.

The Democratic convention held in Baltimore in 1840 was the first to adopt and promulgate a formal platform, and the first resolution contained in that platform was in these words:

Resolved, That the Federal Government is one of limited powers, derived solely from the Constitution, and the grants of powers shown therein ought to be strictly construed by all the departments and agents of the Government, and that it is inexpedient and dangerous to exercise doubtful constitutional powers.

This statement of the faith of the party has been reannounced and affirmed by every Democratic national convention that has been held since that time, and the policy contained in it has been supported and upheld, vigorously and consistently, by the Democratic Members of Congress whenever occasion required.

I will quote from some of the Democratic platforms. The first clause of that adopted at Chicago in 1892 is in these words:

SECTION 1. The representatives of the Democratic Party of the United States in national convention assembled do reaffirm their allegiance to the principles of the party as formulated by Jefferson and exemplified by the long and illustrious line of his successors in Democratic leadership from Madison to Cleveland; we believe the public welfare demands that these principles be applied to the conduct of the Federal Government through the accession to power of the party that advocates them; and we solemnly declare that the need of a return to these fundamental principles of a free, popular government, based on home rule and individual liberty, was never more urgent than now, when the tendency to centralize all power at the Federal Capital has become a menace to the reserved rights of the States that strikes at the very root of our Government under the Constitution as framed by the fathers of the Republic.

The platform adopted by the convention held in the same city in 1896 contained the following statement upon this subject:

During all these years the Democratic Party has resisted the tendency of selfish interests to the centralization of governmental power, and steadfastly maintained the integrity of the dual system of government established by the founders of this Republic of Republics. Under its guidance and teachings the great principle of local self-government has found its best expression in the maintenance of the rights of the States and in its assertion of the necessity of confining the General Government to the exercise of the powers granted by the Constitution of the United States.

And the last announcement of the party, in the platform adopted at the convention held at Baltimore in 1912, is in these words:

Believing that the most efficient results under our system of government are to be obtained by the full exercise by the States of their reserved sovereign powers, we denounce as usurpation the efforts of our opponents to deprive the States of any of the rights reserved to them and to enlarge and magnify by indirection the powers of the Federal Government.

The Democratic Party when it came into power in 1893 repealed every statute upon the subject of Federal interference with elections in the States and swept from the statute books the last vestige of such legislation. After this, when the force bill legislation was attempted, every Democrat then in this Chamber voted against it, and with the aid of a number of western Senators, who entertained like views, the legislation was defeated; and since then no legislation interfering with the domestic elections of the States has been introduced into Congress. It is now proposed that the Senate, in which the Democratic Party has a majority and under a Democratic administration, enact a law controlling the nomination of candidates for the office of Senator to represent the several States, and thus go far beyond anything that has heretofore ever been even proposed in the interference of the domestic and local affairs of the States. It remains to be seen whether Senators, whose predecessors fought such measures for more than half a century, will change front upon this question and whether the Democratic Party will repudiate its doctrine that "the Federal Government is one of limited powers, derived solely from the Constitution," and that it is "inexpedient and dangerous to exercise doubtful constitutional powers."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand that the Senator from Tennessee offers in his own behalf the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do, if it is necessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is necessary. The Senator from Georgia is not in the Chamber.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then I offer the amendment of which notice was given by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, before the Senator from Tennessee takes his seat I desire to ask him a question. Many of the States are deeply interested in the questions here involved. I have great confidence in the Senator's legal ability and in his judgment. I have not, however, had the good fortune of being able to hear all the Senator has said on the subject. Do I understand the Senator, from what I have heard of his remarks, to declare as his opinion that under the seventeenth amendment the States can proceed as they please to nominate candidates for Senator, provided only that under that amendment they elect them by the people instead of by the legislature?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is the contention of the Senator?

Mr. SHIELDS. And I think that primary elections should be legalized in all the States for the purpose of nominating candidates for Senator; that all candidates should be nominated in that way; and that the spirit of the seventeenth amendment can not be fully carried out in any other way.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I fully agree with the expression of the Senator as to that; I am in sympathy with it and believe in it, but this question comes up: For instance, in my State I was chosen at a primary election, when there was no law providing for such an election. It was merely an advisory election, as we call it, the legislature agreeing to vote for the candidate who received the most votes before the people. Under the Senator's contention we need no legislation to make a nomination under the present State law just as effective as this legislation could make it; and that is true in any State, whether it happens to have a law such as is in existence in Arizona or no law on the subject, as is the case in the State of Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think, under the provisions of the bill as reported, which the amendment proposes to strike out, there would be no change whatever in holding elections or in nominating candidates for Senator. If the amendment is agreed to and the language is stricken out, the same result would follow until the States by their own action, through their own general assemblies, change their present method. That is what I say should be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I do not desire to say anything further in relation to the matter of the power of Congress to legislate on this subject. I have submitted everything that I care to say regarding it. That the power exists I entertain no doubt whatever. I desire that Senators should, however, before voting upon this question, bear in mind what the conditions will be if this amendment is adopted. The Australian ballot system is now in operation in practically every State in the Union; that is, I believe there is no State now that elects under the old system. Bear in mind that this bill, if the pending amendment is agreed to, will make applicable only that portion of the election laws of any State which bear upon the final determination, the final vote, on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November. I dare say it is not at all unlikely that if the matter had never been debated here, the word "election," as used in the bill, would include all the machinery, but by reason of the debate it would be given the restricted significance.

Understand this thing well. If there is in a State no law at all in relation to the nomination of candidates for United States Senator, there will, of course, be no law by which the nominees of any particular party will be able to get their names upon the ballot. Let us take——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not quite understand that. I want to understand it clearly, and I desire to ask a question for information. Does the Senator mean to say that in a State such as Mississippi, for example, which has already a law for the primary nomination and now, under the seventeenth amendment, has election of Senators, there would be no way to put upon the ticket at the general election the name of the man who had been nominated by the Democratic Party and the man who had been nominated by the Republican Party?

Mr. WALSH. Not at all, Mr. President, because this bill would have no application to the State of Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then let me ask the Senator another question.

Mr. WALSH. You must give me the case of a State that has no specific law in relation to the nomination and election of a Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, let me take a State, if there be one—and I suppose there are yet some—which has the system which we had in Mississippi before the primary law. That system left it to each party to make its own nominations in its own way. There was no law governing nominations upon the statute books. The executive committee of each party called a convention of each party to meet upon a certain day to choose a nominee of that party for each office. When the convention met it chose the nominees. We had the Australian ballot for the general election at that time, and, by the way, it was the pure Australian ballot, and not the mongrel system that exists in most of the States. Does the Senator mean to say that under that condition, if it now existed in Mississippi, the officers could not go ahead and put the names of the nominees of the two conventions upon the ticket just as well as if they had been nominated by a primary election?

Mr. WALSH. Not at all, Mr. President. I do not mean to say so at all; that is not the situation. When the Senator's State adopted the Australian ballot system, but did not have any primary-election system, and the prevailing method of making nominations was by State conventions——

Mr. WILLIAMS. By party conventions.

Mr. WALSH. By party conventions—State conventions—the Australian ballot law must necessarily have provided that the candidates for the various offices therein named should be nominated by conventions or by petition, and provide how many would have to sign the petition or the procedure that would have to be gone through with by the convention in order that the nominees of that convention or the nominees of the party signing the petition would be able to go to the proper officer of the State and say, "We are the nominees."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose that condition now exists, after the adoption of the seventeenth amendment, why can not the same procedure that took place before its adoption by the same party in putting upon the Australian ballot the name of the nominee of the party be still complied with?

Mr. WALSH. It will be. The law that you had there, which did not contemplate either the nomination or the election of a candidate for United States Senator, but did contemplate the nomination by convention of a governor, a secretary of state, and a State treasurer will be expanded in its operation so as to include a United States Senator. That State will go on and make its nomination for United States Senator just the same as it makes its nomination for governor and for secretary of state; and the nominee for United States Senator will, under the provisions of this bill, be entitled to have his name go on the ballot just the same as the other nominees. That is what this bill is for.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I thought. Then I do not see how it could result in any possible contingency that the name of a nominee could not be placed upon the ballot.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to get this point of difference between my friends here clear in my own mind. As I understand, the contention of the Senator from Montana is this: That if a State has a primary election law and an Australian ballot law governing the general election, the officers provided to be nominated under the State primary law will, having been nominated by a primary, or having been nominated by a convention, if they have that system, go upon the ballot to be voted for at the general election, and that the laws are so drawn now that they only cover State officers—they do not provide in some of the States, at least, for United States Senator—and consequently if we were now to pass this bill so that it applied only to the election of Senators there would be no law in the State to provide for the nomination of United States Senators, because the State laws have not yet covered that proposition, and there would be no law by Congress, because it would be stricken out by the terms of this bill. Now——

Mr. WILLIAMS rose.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me for just a moment, take my own State as an illustration. While I have not examined the law with reference to it, I think I may fairly use the situation as I understand it as an illustration. We have a primary election law which provides how each State officer shall be nominated and names the officers, but only the State officers, of course. Then follows an election law, providing how these officers who have been nominated in the manner provided for shall go upon the ballot. If you were to pass this bill, making it apply only to the election but not to the nomination, then we would find ourselves in this condition: That at the election, when they went to put a Senator's name on the ticket, the question would be, How was he nominated? It is provided in the State law that every man nominated in the primary election shall go upon the ballot——

Mr. WILLIAMS. How do you nominate Senators in Missouri now?

Mr. REED. Just a moment—but the candidate for Senator was not nominated by the primary, and there was no means to nominate him. Therefore we deny him the right to have his name put upon the ballot. That condition, I think, would arise in my State.

Now, the Senator asks a question which is a little aside from that——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think not, because if the Senator is nominated at all, whether by primary or not, he goes upon the ticket.

Mr. REED. The way a Senator is nominated now in my State is under a law which clearly would not be applicable. It is this: Each candidate for the Senate who desires to run shall file his name with the secretary of state at or before a given time; he shall state whether he is a Democrat or a Republican or a Socialist or to what party he belongs; that when the tickets for the Democratic Party—and I will use that one party for illustration and not follow it into the other parties—are printed the names of all who have filed as candidates for the Democratic nomination will be printed upon that ballot, and the voter shall strike out the names of those he does not desire to vote for, leaving his choice; that then, when the votes are counted—and this all takes place at the general election—the one who has received the highest number of votes shall be entitled to the votes of all the members of the legislature of that political faith, and that it shall be their duty to vote for him.

I hardly think that method of nomination could be made applicable to a case of this kind.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In your State, then, each man who wanted to be a candidate would have his name upon the ticket, and the people would have a chance to vote for a United States Senator. If the people elected one of them by a plurality of votes, no matter how he was nominated, or no matter if he had never been nominated at all, he would be the United States Senator.

Mr. REED. I have not made myself plain to the Senator. This all takes place at a general election. You are not voting for a Senator. You are voting, under our law, to instruct a member of the legislature to cast a vote for a Senator.

To illustrate, I will assume that the Senator and myself were two Democrats residing in Missouri and desiring to have the Democratic members of the legislature instructed to vote for us for the United States Senate. At the general election the vote would take place as to which of us should be the candidate of the party. The Republicans would do the same thing upon their ticket. At the end of the election, when it was over, my friend here, we will say, would be the Democratic nominee, and then all the Democratic members of the legislature would be in duty bound to vote for him.

How would you apply that; how would it be possible to apply it to an election of this kind? For instance, the Senator gets his nomination by the political party on the very day of the election, and the day of the election is the time the people ought to be electing a United States Senator. You can not be nominated and elected on the same day.

Therefore I am perfectly clear that the law we have could not be made applicable to a case of this kind. We would have to assume, in the State of Missouri, that the candidates for the Senate should be nominated in August, at the August primary, when the rest of the State officers were to be nominated, and then, having been nominated, put their names upon the ticket.

In Missouri there is no provision expressly authorizing voting for a Senator at the August primary. On the contrary, it is expressly provided that that nomination shall take place at the November election. So it is, at least, a strained construction of the statute to say that you could call for a nomination at the August primary.

My own opinion about it is that the only way we could get a Senator's name upon the ballots would be to have a petition filed, for there is a provision of that kind, and in some way work out an adjustment or a settlement along that line.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, clearly the adjustment might be worked out through the petition in Missouri, but even in the case stated by the Senator from Missouri, if the names of a certain number of people would be placed upon that ticket upon the general election day, and the seventeenth amendment having meanwhile wiped out the legislature as the forum for an election and having substituted therefor a plurality of the people, I do not care whether the men whose names were upon that ballot were there as nominees of parties or why or how; the man who got the plurality that day would be the United States Senator, "elected by the people."

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, suppose that our election law now provides that no man's name shall go upon the election ballots unless he was nominated at the primary in the method spoken of. Then, when the secretary of state went to print the ballots, any man might step up and enjoin putting the names of these men on the ballots as candidates for the Senate, because they had not been nominated in accordance with the State law. If we put into this bill a provision that they can be nominated in that way, Congress, I think, having the power to do that, then the names could go on.

I do not think there is any danger in providing this temporary means, because, unless the bill has been changed since I read it—I have not read it during the last day or two—it carefully provides that this is to be effective only until the State sees fit to pass a statute on the subject. It is ad interim legislation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I desire to say that I fail to be convinced, as I generally am convinced, by the statement of the Senator from Montana, reinforced by the statement of the Senator from Missouri. It seems to me that in the case the Senator from Misouri has instanced he has raised a difficulty which he himself has dissipated.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to interrupt the Senator there for a moment to add that I think I can present a case to the Senator in such a way that he will clearly apprehend my posision, at least.

I want the Senator now to consider the case of a State which has a general election law and has a primary election law, neither of which is applicable to the election of a United States Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This bill would make the general election law applicable to the election of a United States Senator.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly; so it would.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Without that part of the amendment about the nomination.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly. Now, we pass this bill, making it applicable only to the election.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. That State now has a final election law applicable to United States Senators as well as to all other officers, but it has no law at all with relation to the nomination of United States Senators. Good. Now, the chairman of the State central committee of the Democratic Party in that State says to himself, "There is no law in relation to making nominations for United States Senators; I will call a convention." Some other gentlemen feel that that is not the right thing to do, and when the primary election is held they proceed to write in on the ballot, "Democratic candidate for United States Senator, John Jones," another fellow. These two gentlemen come up to the State officers, each claiming that he is the nominee of the Democratic Party for United States Senator and each claiming the right to have his name go upon the ballot as such nominee. In such a case, what would the Senator do?

Mr. WILLIAMS. My answer to that would be that as secretary of state I would put them both on. They have a right to go there. A man need not be nominated at all in order to be elected as a United States Senator.

Mr. WALSH. There is no doubt about that; but a man can not go on the ballot as the candidate of the Democratic Party unless he is the candidate of the Democratic Party.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, there is no doubt about that, also; and the secretary of state could decide that question for himself and place one man's name on as the party nominee, and then the other man's name would go on the ballot, but not as the candidate of the Democratic Party. That would give the people a chance to vote for either, and that is all that this seventeenth amendment purposes.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the Senator for a minute.

Mr. SHIELDS. So far as I know, in all elections, especially in my State, a candidate does not go upon the ballot as the candidate of any party. There is nothing there to designate his politics.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nor is there in my State.

Mr. SHIELDS. Further, if he is not nominated, there is a provision in our Australian ballot and in nearly all the States, just as stated in the cyclopedia as the general consensus of the laws of the States, that upon the petition of a certain number of voters in each county his name is placed on the ballot.

I know in the last race we had in Tennessee with which I had something to do, in the case of the judicial ticket in the State at large there were two Democratic candidates in the field, and both were nominated, one in a primary and one by a Democratic convention. To save all question about getting on the ticket, as to who had the right to be certified, we certified them both, and then we had the petitions of 15 voters in each county petitioning for the names to go on.

There never is any difficulty in getting the name on a ballot. The laws are all liberal for that; and if the name is not there, there are blanks to write it in and there is paste to paste it on.

Mr. WALSH. There is no trouble at all about getting your name on the ballot. That is not the question, because anybody can put any name on the ballot. The question is: How are you going to get on there as the nominee of the Democratic Party?

Now, it is no answer to say that anybody who comes up and claims to be the nominee of the Democratic Party can go into the Democratic column; and if there is a so-called Australian ballot in the State of Tennessee that does not recognize parties, it is not an Australian ballot at all, as we understand the thing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand, in that situation this officer would be required to certify that one of these men was the nominee, whichever in his opinion, under his official oath, acting under the circumstances, he thought was the nominee of the Democratic Party. He would go upon that sort of a ballot under a Democratic heading, or as a Democrat. The other man would have a right to go upon the ballot, not as the nominee of the Democratic Party but as a candidate for the Senate at the general election, and the people's right to elect a Senator would be preserved.

Mr. President, the seventeenth amendment requires an election of United States Senators by the people. In it and by it there is conferred upon the Federal Government the right to make, where the State has failed, that requirement, to wit, that the Senator shall be chosen by an election by the people rather than by the legislature. The seventeenth amendment does not delegate to the Federal Government the power to require primaries to make the nominations; and if that had been expressly asked of this body and of the people of the United States as a part of the seventeenth amendment, I, for one, do not believe the seventeenth amendment would have gotten the requisite two-thirds.

At any rate, whether my judgment be in that respect correct or not, the general principle that the Federal Government has simply the power which is delegated to it, either expressly or by necessary and proper inference, applies to this as to all other cases.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would rather finish. I am not going to make a speech. I just want to make a few remarks and then sit down; as John Allen used to say, "a few unnecessary remarks."

If by the seventeenth amendment there is conferred in any manner at all upon the Federal Government the power to require primaries for nominations, then it must be conferred by necessary and proper implication, not expressly, because all of you admit that it is not expressly conferred. If it is conferred by necessary and proper implication, the only implication which can confer it is that a primary mode of nomination is part of a general election. So you bring it down by analysis to a single question: Is a primary a part of an election?

Now, it happens that in this case the legal authorities cited by the Senator from Tennessee seem to accord with ordinary common sense—a thing which, by the way, they do not always do.

I expect maybe the reason all of you take the position that a primary nomination is a part of an election is because you all won out at the primaries in your States, but I hazard the opinion that if you should leave it to the defeated candidates, the men you defeated at the general election, they would not consider a primary a part of the election.

The man who holds the opinion that a primary nomination is a part of a general election—that a party primary to determine a party's choice is a part of a general election to determine the people's choice—takes the rather queer position that being a candidate is the holding of an office. I never knew any other distinguished authority to take that position except "old Aunt Maria," who belonged to John Allen's grandfather.

John told me once that he met the old darky, and she said: "Marse John, I sho' am glad to see you. I belonged to your grandpap, and you reminds me so much of him." John replied: "Why, Aunt Maria, I have always heard that I looked like my mother's side of the family." She said: "Oh, Marse John, I don't mean that you looks like him, but you is like him; you acts so much like him, and your calling and your work is so much like his'n." John said: "Why, in what respect?" "Well," she said, "he used to be a-going around all the time a-holding of some office or other, just like you." John, not knowing that his grandfather had ever held an office, said: "Aunt Maria, what office did my grandfather hold?" "Why," she said, "Marse John, de office of candidate—the very one that you is now a-holding of." [Laughter.]

Now, absurd as it may seem, if you will go off and think about it, and leave your law books and your legal cobwebs out of your head, no man can any more think that a party primary to select a party nominee is a part of a general election than he can think that being a candidate is holding an office.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I risk a suggestion on this subject notwithstanding the old colored lady's view of what constituted an office.

The Senator from Mississippi was of the opinion that if this proposition had been suggested at the time the amendment was up for consideration it would have had some effect upon the question of its adoption. The Senator from Mississippi was not a Member of the Senate at that time, but this proposition was discussed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator misunderstood me. Of course the question was discussed and referred to in one way or another, but if there had been put into the amendment the express delegation to the Federal Government of the power to require primary party elections in the States I said I believed that would have had an antagonistic effect upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to say that it was considered by some that the change which was made in the proposed amendment after it was brought onto the floor of the Senate did so provide; at least in sufficient terms to give control of primary elections. The resolution as it was first brought into the Senate had eliminated from the Constitution of the United States the provision:

> But the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

When the proposed seventeenth amendment first came in its provisions eliminated that provision from the Constitution of the United States, and it was insisted by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] that that should be the amendment and that that clause of the Constitution should be eliminated. Otherwise, he said, it would give the National Government increased control over the entire method and manner of holding elections.

That particular subject was debated and discussed, as to what power the National Government would have under the proposed amendment as it came from the committee, and what power the National Government would have if what is known as the Bristow or Sutherland amendment were adopted, which placed this provision back in the Constitution. It was insisted by some that if this provision of Senator BRISTOW'S were adopted it would give the National Government the right to provide for primary elections and to control and regulate every step from the beginning to the close of the election. That matter was debated here at quite considerable length; and, notwithstanding that, they adopted the Bristow amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was one of the men who took the position that the resolution when it was brought in was better than the resolution that was finally passed, but I did not base my position upon that ground. I based it upon the ground that if the Bristow amendment were adopted, that would give to the Federal Government not power over the primary elections in the States, but power over the manner of holding the elections in the States, and might finally lead to the reintroduction of the old United States marshal supervisory system, or the system sought to be put into operation by the so-called force bill.

If there was any general admission by anybody that the passage of the resolution in the Bristow form would give any right to control the primaries, it has escaped my memory. My memory is not a very good one; but I do remember distinctly that I, for one, was very much afraid—and I have not altogether lost my fear yet—that it would lead to the Federal Government interfering in the elections in the States in the old way. Moreover, I was afraid that it might have the effect of defeating the amendment itself when it went before the people.

My fears upon that subject subsequently to the adoption of the amendment itself were allayed. I saw no spirit of that sort in the country; but it does yet give that opportunity, and I regret that it was passed in the shape it was rather than in the other shape.

One word more, if the Senator will pardon me, and then I shall yield the floor. I wish to say that I hope the part of this amendment relating to nominations in the States will be stricken out of it. I wish to add that I believe that if it is ever tested in the courts the courts will declare that it is unconstitutional. I wish to add to that, in the third place, that if it is not stricken out I shall still vote for the bill, because I think it is absolutely necessary that provision be made for the general elections, and I shall trust the courts to take care of that part of it which I regard as being contrary to the Constitution without destroying the entire law. I do not think they are mutually dependent upon one another.

Mr. BORAH. There were undoubtedly those who were of the same opinion as the Senator from Mississippi at the time we had this resolution up for discussion; that is, that by reason of the Bristow amendment it would enable the National Government to take control of the elections somewhat, and even to a greater extent than it did under the act of 1870. But there were others who contended for the Bristow amendment for the specific reason that they believed it would give the National Government the power to do what we are now proposing to do.

While I do not propose to quote at length from the debates, during the debate upon this subject it was said:

> I will state here now my exact opposition to and my reason for opposing the Sutherland amendment—

Which was the same as the Bristow amendment—

> Under this system, in my judgment, Congress could of its own motion interfere with our entire election machinery, our system of registration, our primary law, our ballot, and the entire mechanism of conducting elections. When you have said that, in my judgment you have fixed the boundary line between what the Government may do under section 4 and the line beyond which they may do all that has been claimed that ought to be done without section 4.

So, Mr. President, that matter was up for consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Whom is the Senator quoting?

Mr. BORAH. I was quoting from myself.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes. Well, the Senator is still of that opinion.

Mr. BORAH. I thought perhaps it would have more effect upon the Senator if I did not give the author. I only quoted that, however, to show that it entered into the debate; not as a controlling view at all, but that it was a subject matter which we had up for discussion.

Mr. President, I do not propose at this late hour to enter upon a discussion of this matter. I only desire to say that, as I expressed it then and as I express it now, I have no doubt in the world as to the power of Congress to provide the method of nominating Senators and Representatives.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator was reading the debate over the seventeenth amendment?

Mr. BORAH. That is correct.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand that the debates of conventions or of legislative bodies at the time a constitutional provision was adopted or an act was passed may be considered to ascertain the construction of it; but I can not see the relevancy of this. The bill under consideration is not proposed to be passed under the seventeenth amendment. The power here sought to be exercised is under section 4 of Article I of the old Constitution—an entirely different thing.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator had listened attentively, the Senator would have seen that that was the particular clause of the Constitution to which he refers which we were seeking to eliminate. It is true that the seventeenth amendment does not do so, but it was proposed to do so. Section 4 was left in the Constitution by changing the proposed amendment as it came from the committee. It was section 4 to which we had reference when we were discussing the matter.

Mr. SHIELDS. Still, that was a provision already in the Constitution. You were not adopting that provision then.

Mr. BORAH. No.

Mr. SHIELDS. You were not the framers of it.

Mr. BORAH. No; but the Senator does not understand. The proposed seventeenth amendment, as it came from the committee, sought to repeal or to annul or to cancel that part of section 4 of the Constitution; and the Sutherland amendment was for the purpose of putting it back, or, rather, of eliminating it from the seventeenth amendment and leaving it as it is now. If the amendment had been adopted as it came from the committee, it would have eliminated that provision of the Constitution entirely. The seventeenth amendment did not pass the Senate as it came from the committee. It was changed as it came upon the floor of the Senate by what was known as the Sutherland or Bristow amendment. The very object of that amendment was to preserve section 4 as it had always been in the Constitution.

Mr. President, while I have no doubt as to the power of the Congress to pass this kind of a law, I have always been very much in favor of leaving the question of elections entirely to the States. It was for that reason that I opposed the Bristow amendment and the Sutherland amendment. I have always felt that the States could better deal with these matters and that they are peculiarly local matters.

If this matter stood without the hiatus which is created by the reason of the passage of the seventeenth amendment, I would see no reason for passing this law. But, Mr. President, we have the hiatus by reason of the passage of the seventeenth amendment. We have the different States providing almost invariably for the nomination of the State officers by primaries. We have the method of putting the names of the nominees upon the Australian ballot. We have in none of the States any provision for the nomination of Senators in the primary, and we have no method of putting the names upon the Australian ballot.

The real object to be accomplished by this law is to provide a method and manner of extending the State laws to Senators. If all the different States of the Union had already met in legislatures and provided a system for nominating Senators and Representatives and a method of putting their names upon the Australian ballot, there would be no occasion for passing this law. But it is to bridge over that situation, to provide a method by which we may have uniform action until the States may come up to the seventeenth amendment and act thereunder.

Therefore it is necessary to exercise this power at this time in order that we may proceed properly and in a uniform way, and that we may have some system and some method by which to nominate Senators and get their names upon the ballot. That is the real reason, as I understand it, for the passage of this law. It is to extend the State laws to the nomination and election of Senators.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to supplement what the Senator from Idaho has said by just a word, this bill does not attempt to prescribe a law regulating primary elections or regulating the nomination of Senators. It simply adopts the law of the State which is already in existence. I can not understand why anybody should be disturbed about that being done. The State of Tennessee has already a law which its legislature deems to be wise and proper, which regulates the nomination of Representatives in Congress, either by a primary or by a convention, I do not know which, but in one way or another. This proposed law does not seek in any way to change that or to antagonize it. It simply adopts it. It adopts the law which the State of Tennessee has already by its legislature declared to be wise to regulate the nomination of candidates for a similar office.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the basis of the objection was clearly stated by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] when he offered his amendment, and it has been, I think, stated quite a number of times since then. The objection is because a nominating device is not a part of an election. Therefore Congress has no power to legislate upon the subject, and the act would be unconstitutional whether it provided an elaborate scheme or simply provides, as it does, for the enforcement of the State law. One is embraced in the other. If it can, as it proposes to do, enforce the State laws, it could provide an elaborate scheme upon the subject of nominations. It is the principle involved that is the basis of the first ground of objection. The second is that it is an unnecessary and unwarranted interference in the local self-government of the States.

Mr. BORAH. It could not possibly be an unwarranted interference in the affairs of the State locally if it should prove to be unconstitutional.

Mr. SHIELDS. That, of course, would be true in a legal sense, but it is unwarranted by the necessities of the situation. Of course, if it is constitutional, there is a warrant in the fundamental law for it. I did not use the word in that sense. I think the sense in which I used it was apparent from the connection.

Mr. BORAH. If it is constitutional it could not be an interference in State affairs, because anything which the National Government has authority to do can not be deemed to be an interference with State affairs if it does it. On the other hand, if it is unconstitutional it could not be an interference, because it would be held to be void. If this is constitutional it can not be deemed to be an encroachment on the State powers.

Mr. SHIELDS. Yes, Mr. President; the election laws of the Federal Government have been considered to be an unnecessary interference with State elections ever since this has been a Government. The only one that ever passed was bitterly opposed on that ground, and when the force bill was up and a further interference was attempted it was bitterly opposed and defeated.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Tennessee a question before he takes his seat? Perhaps the Senator covered it in the address which he made, but I was in and out of the Chamber and I did not hear all that he said. Under a former law of Congress we regulated the registration of voters. We provided for inspectors. Does the Senator think that Congress had the power to regulate the registration of voters preliminary to the holding of an election?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do. That was held by the Supreme Court in half a dozen cases to be a valid law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That was sustained by the Supreme Court in at least two cases. That it seems to me is no more a part of the election than the nomination of candidates. As the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has pointed out, under the Australian ballot system it is absolutely necessary to have candidates. It is quite as necessary to have candidates to be voted for as it is to have voters to vote for them. For the life of me I can not see any distinction between a power to regulate the registration of voters preliminary to holding an actual election and a law regulating the nomination of candidates to be voted for by those voters.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the Senator evidently was out or I failed to make myself clear. I produced and read authorities showing that there was no necessity to have nominations in order to allow candidates to be voted for under the Australian ballot system. I read at length from those authorities. Second, as to primaries or nominating devices being a part of the election, would the Senator say that the old-fashioned mass convention and the old-fashioned soap-box primaries, held under the direction of parties, and generally fraudulently held, were a part of the election machinery?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not necessarily, Mr. President, but——

Mr. SHIELDS. Then, Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me finish.

Mr. SHIELDS. If primaries held under party organization only, so conducted and so regulated, were party machinery, I said while the Senator was out that the mere legalizing and regulating that party organization by law does not make it a part of the election any more than the regulation of gambling would make it a department of the Government.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I had not quite completed my answer. I said not necessarily, but I proceeded to say, if provision is made by law for a printed ballot like the Australian ballot, then conventions or some other methods of presenting candidates, whose names can be entered by some official authority upon those ballots, becomes a part of the election. They have become a part of the election in, I suppose, substantially every State of the American Union to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator fom Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

Mr. SHIELDS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] has asked for a little further time to discuss this matter. I do not want to prevent anyone from having an opportunity to say whatever he wishes to say about the matter, and I ask that the bill be now temporarily laid aside for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose the Senator from Tennessee desires to withdraw the call for a quorum.

Mr. SHIELDS. If the bill goes over, of course I do not call for a quorum.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been temporarily laid aside.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 11, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 10, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we bless Thee for the abiding faith down deep in the heart of man, which lifts him above the animal, makes him a religious being, a child of the living God. For where faith is, there is hope; where hope is, there is progress; where progress is, there is love; where love is, there is civilization. For love is the crown of all humanity. It glorifies the individual, sanctifies the home, binds men together in friendship, and makes the world akin.

No one is so accursed by fate,
No one so utterly desolate,
But some heart, though unknown,
Responds unto his own.

And now abideth faith, hope, love, these three; but the greatest of these is love. Increase and magnify these qualities of soul in us until we all come unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RURAL POST ROADS.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bill H. R. 11686, the good-roads bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me before his motion is put, I would like to ask him how much time it will probably take to complete the consideration of this bill?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I can hardly say. I want to get it through as fast as I can. I understand the situation the House is in, and I want to accommodate the gentleman from Alabama as much as I can, and we will do our best to push the bill along. The last section that has anything very material in it has already been read. When that is finished I think we can have a vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that there is an appropriation bill on the calendar that ought to be considered. It really was in a sense displaced by this bill. I think we ought to close this up as soon as we can.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I feel embarrassed by that situation myself. I recognize that the appropriation bill to some extent was laid aside for this bill, but it could not very well be avoided. I will do all I can to get this bill out of the way of the appropriation bill at the earliest possible moment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11686, the good-roads bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11686, the good-roads bill, with Mr. RUBEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11686, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11686) to provide that the United States shall, in certain cases, aid the States and the civil subdivisions thereof in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad if we can get along with this bill as rapidly as possible. The appropriating committees are pushing us. I will ask unanimous consent that the debate on this section and amendments thereto shall conclude in 30 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. How long?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. In 30 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I shall want 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I see no reason why this bill should not be pushed as rapidly as possible, but if we are here to legislate on a proposition involving $25,000,000 there is very little use in hurrying it through without adequate consideration. I do not think any gentleman in the House has any disposition to delay unnecessarily the passage of this bill. I am sure I have none. But there are some points that ought to be considered. I shall not object to this request to conclude debate in 30 minutes, except that I have here two amendments to this section which I wish to offer, and I want the time in which to offer them and 5 minutes apiece in which to discuss them.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I take it that the other three sections will not cause any debate at all.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. So far as I know, they will not; but I am not informed, of course, as to what gentlemen have in their minds.

Mr. BORLAND. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that probably there will be no amendments to the last section, but I have a substitute for the entire bill which I wish to offer.

Mr. MANN. This section 4 is so very important that I hope the gentleman will give a little longer time for its consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object. Why not make it an hour?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I did not catch the suggestion of the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I say you had better make it an hour on this section.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Well, the gentleman has suggested an hour and I have suggested 30 minutes. Let us split the difference and make it 40 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Make it 50 minutes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. No; let us make it 40 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Make it 50. I do not want any time at all myself. This is the most important section of the bill and the one that is least understood.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Well, then, Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be concluded in 50 minutes, one half of that time to be controlled by myself and the other half by somebody else, to be designated.

Mr. BORLAND. I desire 10 minutes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. With that understanding, then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that there be 50 minutes' debate, I to control one half of the time and the gentleman from Kansas City, Mr. BORLAND, the other half.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending section and amendments thereto be concluded in 50 minutes, the gentleman himself to control one half of the time and his colleague from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] to control the other half. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I will state that at the close of what I am about to say I am going to raise a point of order. For some reason that I do not understand, when this bill was brought up for consideration the time of debate was taken all on one side. Those who were opposed to the bill had nothing to say as to the division of time. The gentleman from Missouri very kindly took one half of the time, to be controlled by himself as chairman of the committee, and gave his supporters the other half of the time.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. DONOVAN. I appeal to the chairman of the committee [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] that he ought to do things in a parliamentary way and not set a bad example——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I did not address the gentleman from Connecticut. I addressed the Chair, to inquire if the gentleman from Connecticut would yield for an interruption.

Mr. DONOVAN. Not at this time. The gentleman has taken up about all the time that has been taken up in this House, and he ought to be willing to wait a moment or two. I am now about to raise the point of order that I read on page 3363, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] made the point of order that no debate having taken place, the motion to close debate is not in order. So——

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. DONOVAN. That the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] can not make a motion to close debate, as no debate has taken place.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not made a motion. He has asked unanimous consent.

Mr. DONOVAN. Well, then, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut objects.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to section 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment to section 4, which the Clerk will report.

The clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 6, by striking out lines 4 to 10, inclusive, and inserting: "Such statement by the governor shall be accompanied by a report by a highway department of the State having full power to locate, improve, construct, and maintain highways in the State, and to expend the road funds of the State."

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am very anxious that the good-roads legislation passed by Congress shall aid in the construction of a better class of highways, and shall encourage the States in the efforts they have made rather than retard them. There has been a great deal said about the needs and sentiments of people who live in the rural districts, as though they were in some way antagonistic to people who live in sections where good roads are already established. But men who come from sections where good roads are already established are in favor of a higher type of roads. That is one advantage of the improvement of roads. It increases the interest in a higher type of roads. The present activity throughout the States has taken this concrete form, generally and uniformly: It has taken the form of a State highway commission with ample power to locate, improve, and maintain roads. The location is one thing, the style of improvement is another, and ample provision for maintenance is another. In the past many good roads have been constructed where there was no provision for maintenance, and the communities were under a heavy burden which they had to bear and under heavy bonds which they had to pay after the roads were practically worn out. That difficulty has been corrected in a measure, and the lost motion and the waste of taxation from isolated local control, working without the facilities for road improvement, have been obviated in the States by the creation of State highway commissions. So generally is that recognized that nearly every State that has embarked upon better roads has done it through the medium of a State highway commission.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman means to say that every State has done that, the gentleman is entirely mistaken; because there are States which have no State highway commission, and yet they have embarked on the proposition of building roads, and they build them through county commissioners.

Mr. LANGLEY. That is true of Kentucky; that is, Kentucky has no State road fund.

Mr. HOWARD. That is true of Georgia.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted, it will serve to cut out many States in the Union from participation in this fund. I am reminded that there are 23 States in the Union to-day which do not have State highway commissioners.

Mr. BORLAND. Then that leaves 25 States that have them.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; but the gentleman's proposition would give all this money to those 25 and exclude the other 23.

Mr. LANGLEY. In other words, he would be retarding the very movement that he seeks to assist.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, in my State of Maryland we have two systems, one a system for the building of local roads, and the other a system for the building of arteries from the various county seats to the city of Baltimore. Under the first system the counties share in the expense of building the road, as under this bill the States do. Under the other system we have a State road commission, and the State bonds itself and builds the main arteries throughout the State.

Mr. BORLAND. That is one system that is very prevalent; but the drafters of this bill recognize the importance of a State highway commission, because in this bill they penalize the States that do not have State highway commissions by taking away 10 per cent of their allotment.

Mr. HOWARD rose.

Mr. BORLAND. I am sorry that I can not yield to the gentleman from Georgia, because I have promised to limit my own time.

That is what this section says, that a State not having a highway commission is penalized 10 per cent. Now, I want to find out whether that is simply on the surface, or whether it means what it says. If the drafters of this bill intended to put some pressure on the States in order that they must have State highway commissions, if they believed that was one of the best ways of securing improved highways, then let us make it effective.

The way to make it effective is to say that a State not having a highway commission legally empowered to construct, improve, and maintain highways shall not participate in this fund. I do not think the provision in the bill is anything more than a bluff. It says that if the report of the governor is accompanied by the report of a highway commission it shall receive the full amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. I will say, for the benefit of the chairman of the committee [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] that when my two minutes have expired we will agree on a division of time. Now, under that provision in the bill, any kind of a body can be designated as a State highway commission for the purpose of avoiding this 10 per cent penalty. That is not hard to do, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] will probably find that his State will immediately have a State highway commission, in name, if this bill passes.

Mr. BARKLEY. We already have a highway commissioner, but he has no money.

Mr. BORLAND. He would make the report, but he has no money; and that is exactly the proposition I am talking about. What on earth is the use of a report from a State highway commission that has no control over the funds of the State or the improvement of the roads? Instead of putting in this penalty, which I say I think is a bluff and will be easily avoided, if it is necessary to have a State highway commission in order to have improved roads, then let us make the having of a State highway commission clothed with legal powers the condition upon which the money can be drawn from the Treasury.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I will again ask that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed in 45 minutes.

Mr. COLLIER. Forty-five minutes on the bill or the paragraph?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. On the section.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if I can have five minutes of that time?

Mr. BORLAND. What was the request?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed in 45 minutes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I said 45 minutes, Mr. Chairman, but I will now ask that all debate conclude in 50 minutes, 25 minutes to be controlled by me and 25 minutes by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed in 50 minutes, 25 of which shall be controlled by him and 25 minutes by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if I can have five minutes of that time?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is the gentleman for or against the bill?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am in favor of the bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will yield the gentleman the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri, or some other gentleman on the committee, a question in regard to the provision on page 6, which provides:

That no charge shall be made for so considering and determining such statement of any governor if the same shall be accompanied by a report from the State highway department of such State as hereinbefore provided; but in all other cases there shall be deducted 10 per cent of the amount which shall be payable on account of the roads in such State under the provisions of this act.

I want to know why that deduction is made.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The deduction is made because it will be more expensive for the Secretary of Agriculture to go into a State and inspect it where there is no highway commissioner than it would be in a State where they have an efficient highway department.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It seems to me entirely too much. Take the case of my own State which, under this bill, gets $706,000. Under this provision there would be $70,600 retained which otherwise would go to that State. Does not the gentleman think that is entirely too large?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The purpose of the committee was to do what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] said was apparently the intention of the committee, although he thought it was a bluff, but it is in good faith, to get all the States to establish a State highway department.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, right upon that point, the State of Tennessee, under its constitution, through its legislature, has the right to pass laws providing for the construction of roads by the various counties. That has worked very well in that State—so well that there has been no change in the law up to this time. If this provision remains in the bill, it will amount to penalizing the State of Tennessee to the extent of $70,000, which is out of all reason, if that sum is expected to be used in the inspection of roads, or of the various classes of roads, by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. KEATING. This suggestion has been made, that it would be best for the National Government if all the States were to have some uniform system; if each State would have a State highway commissioner, the National Government could deal with that commissioner. There is nothing to prevent the State of Tennessee from designating a State highway commissioner who will expend the money as Tennessee desires, and the National Government may deal with that State highway commissioner.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will not argue with the gentleman from Colorado the advisability of having a State highway commission. I agree with the gentleman, but I do not think that Congress ought to undertake to dictate to the States whether they shall have a highway commission or how our work shall be done under our constitution.

Mr. KEATING. I think it is desirable to have uniformity.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address myself particularly to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]. The effect of his amendment is that the counties of the States, no matter how much money they may raise for the improvement of their roads, unless the State highway commissioner or a State highway commission, as the case may be, shall designate that particular county as an area in which the Government would expend a certain sum of money, that county could never reap any benefit of the Federal fund until the State highway commissioner should allow them to do it. I do not believe that it was the intention of the framers of the bill that any one particular person should have plenary power to say what particular county or counties should receive the benefits of this sum to the detriment of other sections in the State. For that reason I think the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] would destroy in effect the provisions of the bill as to the expenditure of money. I believe those provisions are equitable that are carried in the bill.

There is one other provision I would like to call the attention of the Chair to. In the State of Georgia we very wisely work convicts on the road. We have found from experience that that was the best method of getting the convicts out of competition with other labor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was considered, and the amendment was lost.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. The governor of each State may make, under his hand and the seal of the State, and file with the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, a statement setting forth: First, that the State has a highway department or a highway engineer with full legal powers to improve, construct, or maintain rural highways; second, the road or roads within the State to be improved, constructed, or maintained under each of the classes hereinbefore specified; third, the amount of funds available within the control of the highway department or highway engineer of the State for such improvement, construction, and maintenance, which shall not be less than double the allotment to which the State is entitled from the funds of the United States under the terms of this act; fourth, the amount and character of the work which the State will do within the next fiscal year, and the use which is desired to be made of the funds allotted to the State by the Secretary of Agriculture under the authority of this act. Such statement may be filed at any time after the approval of this act, and an annual statement showing necessary changes for the ensuing fiscal year shall be filed on or before the 20th day of January of each year. All subsequent statements, after the first statement filed by the governor, shall show in detail the amount of the improvement, construction, and maintenance of roads accomplished by the State in the prior fiscal year, together with the specific use which has been made of the allotment from the funds of the United States under the terms of this act. The Secretary of Agriculture shall examine said statement and determine, first, whether the State has a highway department or highway engineer clothed with full legal powers over the improvement, construction, and maintenance of rural roads; second, whether the work to be done by the State is feasible and practical within the estimate, and of a proper engineering character to bring the roads within the class or classes designated; third, whether the State, under its constitution and laws, can cooperate with the United States in the improvement, construction, and maintenance of the roads; fourth, whether a proper fund is provided for the maintenance of the system of roads within the State as constructed or proposed to be constructed. If the Secretary of Agriculture be satisfied on these points, he shall adopt the location and classification of the roads as specified by the governor of the State and shall allot to the State its proportion of the road fund created by this act for the fiscal year next ensuing. If the statement as filed by the governor shows a larger amount of improvement, construction, and maintenance of roads than the funds available, including the allotment from the funds of the United States, will be sufficient to accomplish, the Secretary of Agriculture shall withhold the funds until the estimate is reduced. If in any subsequent year, after the allotment to a State of funds from the United States, the statement of the governor fails to show improvement, construction, or maintenance of roads reasonably approximate to the estimate made, subject to the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture, he shall withhold the allotment of money under the terms of this act until the proportion of road work in the State is brought up approximately to the estimate submitted, having in view climatic conditions, increased cost of material, or any unforeseen events or factors.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY].

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a report of the senior highway engineer to the chief engineer of public roads on the condition of roads in the State of Rhode Island, and also a supplementary report.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is a part of my substitute for the bill, which will be found printed in full on page 3160 of the RECORD of February 7. It seeks to do in this country what has been done in every other country of the world, namely, provide for a classification of roads and the improvement of them according to the utilities and necessities for improvement. It seeks further to provide that no State shall bite off more than it can chew; that no State shall undertake to improve roads by seeking Federal appropriation for the purpose unless it has funds and machinery to accomplish what it has undertaken; and that it shall not undertake the improvement of new roads unless there is provision made for the maintenance of existing roads.

Those three things are at the base of good-roads propositions. I want to show the weakness of this bill. This bill provides that the governor of the State shall first classify the roads in his State according to this rental road basis, which, I say, is the accident of how they happened to be constructed now. The big cities have good roads in their vicinity and the small towns have a minor class of roads, but the governor is required to make a statement of the existing kind of roads within the State. The bill provides that the governor shall make a statement of the number of miles which he claims to be in each of the classes, A, B, and C, respectively. He is not required to state what roads are to be improved up to classes A, B, and C, but what is there now. What is done then?

On page 6 of the bill we find a provision that at the end of the fiscal year the United States shall pay on account of the roads so determined to be in classes A, B, and C, as certified by the governor and as approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, as follows, and so forth. It is the existing roads that the governor must certify and that the Government must pay upon. If that should not be clear enough, then we find on page 7, in line 9, a provision that the money paid over by the Federal Government shall be used for the construction, maintenance, and extension of the respective roads "for which paid." In other words, if the bill means what it says, you must pay this rental money to the existing system of roads, and there is no provision anywhere in the bill which any gentleman advocating it can point out for the construction of a single mile of new road. The governor must say that he has so many miles in his State of classes A, B, and C, and the Secretary of Agriculture must say, "Yes, you have," and then the Government will pay so much for those roads, and the governor must distribute it for the respective roads for which paid. That does not provide for the construction of roads where they are needed. It provides for the payment for roads where they exist. It does not provide for the maintenance of roads where they are needed, but where they exist. There is not a single, solitary constructive idea in the bill. This bill is a maximum of politics and a minimum of roads.

I reserve the balance of my time, and now yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY].

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, I do not imagine that anybody will get any satisfaction from speaking against this bill beyond the satisfaction that comes from relieving his feelings to some slight extent. I wish that I had the eloquence to express adequately my real feelings toward this bill. In looking at the bill and trying to find what the report had to say in favor of it I found what was called a supplementary report. If the real report is a supplement, I think that the bill itself could adequately be described as an implement, but whether you would do justice to the powerfulness of the bill by calling it a jimmy or a can of dynamite, I do not know. I think by preference it would better be called a can of dynamite to blow open the strong chest of the Federal Treasury, and to do it so effectively that money will flow from year to year onto mud roads, to be washed into the side ditches every time there is a gentle summer shower. I have gone through the supplementary report and have not got any information upon which anybody could act intelligently, and the information contained in the hearings, so far as given by men of experience, is practically all against the bill.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCOY. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. The gentleman lives in a city district, does he not?

Mr. McCOY. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. The gentleman has no country roads in his district?

Mr. McCOY. I think possibly you could find one or two, but there are plenty in the State of New Jersey.

Mr. ASWELL. But none in the gentleman's district—not very many?

Mr. McCOY. I should say not.

Mr. ASWELL. I thought so.

Mr. McCOY. I should say there are no country roads.

Mr. ASWELL. I thought so.

Mr. McCOY. But I will tell you what there are. There are plenty of sidewalks in my district, and we pay for them; and if we want to get an extension of the free mail delivery service we go down to the Post Office Department and put in the application from our citizens up there, and back comes the report that we have no sidewalks and that we can not get the extension of the free delivery service until we pay for the sidewalks.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCOY. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I suppose the gentleman thoroughly approves of the river and harbor appropriations that are expended on the part of the Federal Government along the Atlantic coast?

Mr. McCOY. I am not very certain whether I do.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Fourteen million dollars of them in the present bill for New York harbors. That is all right, I suppose?

Mr. McCOY. I am not very certain that I think so; and I will say to the gentleman from Virginia that if he would bring in a proper measure to do away with the river and harbor appropriations and leave the expenditure of money for that purpose to the States I am inclined to think that I should be in favor of it, and I will tell the gentleman what would happen then. We in New York and in New Jersey would get some return for our money and in proportion to the amount of taxes we pay, which we do not when we pay to make those improvements in other parts of the country.

Mr. SAUNDERS. How would they get the return?

Mr. McCOY. I do not know how we should get it, except as we ought to, by spending our money under our own supervision. We would tax ourselves and get the money; and I am surprised that the gentleman from Virginia, who I suppose, by implication, disapproves of the river and harbor expenditures, should use the argument that two wrongs make a right, and I do not believe he means to do that.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not use that argument at all, but I say no one can justify the expenditure for rivers and harbors under our Constitution and at the same time raise his voice against a far greater work of domestic development in the way of improving the roads of the entire United States.

Mr. McCOY. I do not agree with the gentleman at all. The Federal Government has exclusive jurisdiction over rivers and harbors, and therefore they expend the money on the rivers and harbors. I say turn those rivers and harbors over to the State of New York and the State of New Jersey, and I believe those States would gladly take jurisdiction of them and spend the necessary money.

Mr. SAUNDERS. What good would jurisdiction do you? How would you get any benefit by having jurisdiction over them?

Mr. McCOY. Because, if the State had jurisdiction and exclusive jurisdiction——

Mr. SAUNDERS. Would you charge tolls?

Mr. McCOY. No.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Then what good would jurisdiction do you?

Mr. McCOY. We would get the benefit of the business done, and that is all that we ought to expect.

Mr. SAUNDERS. You get the benefit under the United States appropriation without having to pay anything.

Mr. McCOY. On the contrary, we pay more than our share—vastly more. I say that the United States appropriation for rivers and harbors is a questionable one as now made. I think that nobody can doubt the unwisdom of this bill, which provides for taking $25,000,000 this year and appropriating it—and the Lord knows how much in the coming years—to turn it into mud roads without any supervision of the expenditure of it.

This bill provides that the United States shall aid in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads under an appropriation not to exceed $25,000,000. The appropriation is to be apportioned to the several States, one-half in the ratio of post-road mileage and one-half in the ratio of population.

The post roads of the United States are grouped in three classes:

Class A, typified by a macadam road.

Class B, by a gravel or sand-clay road.

Class C, by drained, graded, and crowned earth road.

It is then provided that when the mileage of roads in each State in each class shall have been ascertained by the governor of that State and the Secretary of Agriculture, there shall be paid at the end of the fiscal year to the proper State officers designated by the respective governors for each mile of class A, $60; of class B, $30; and of class C, $15, with the condition that, in addition, the State or civil subdivision thereof shall expend an equal sum on the respective miles for which Federal aid is granted.

The resulting joint fund is therefore $120 per mile for macadam roads, $60 per mile for gravel and sand-clay roads, and $30 for earth roads.

In justification and support of this Government aid it has been argued that since the Federal Government uses country roads over which to transport mail once a day it is only fair that it should pay a rental for such use of the roads. If this argument is sound, then the Federal Government should also pay to each city in which letter carriers deliver mail and mail wagons carry mail from the post office to the railroad station an annual rental for such use of its streets and sidewalks. As no one for a moment will contend that such a payment to cities is either necessary, reasonable, or desirable, it follows at once that this argument for the payment of rental for country post roads by the Federal Government can not be taken seriously.

There is no doubt that the general plan for Federal aid to country roads is largely a result of the success of State aid in those States in which it has been adopted. When, however, the success of the State-aid movement is examined it is found that it has been undoubtedly due to reasons among which are the following:

First. There has been established adequate and continuous administration of road work upon a business basis.

Second. There has been an expenditure of money in sufficient amounts to accomplish necessary results on given work.

Third. There has been developed a corps of efficient highway engineers and inspectors, whose experience has been retained.

Fourth. State aid as operated has enabled the distribution of tax revenues from cities to country areas.

Fifth. There has been a strong educational influence due to the presence of roads built by standard methods.

Upon examination of section 4 it is seen at once that it will not provide an expenditure of Federal money along these lines. For, in the first place, it simply turns over money to local officials to expend according to their judgment; in the second place, the amount of money is insufficient to even repair roads in the respective classes, although it might, under good direction, be sufficient for annual maintenance were the roads of the respective classes in first-class repair at the outset. Local authorities will doubtless claim that their roads are in the required state of repair to draw the Federal money. By what miracle this sudden excellence is to appear no one knows. The money granted per mile would never, however, be sufficient for renewals of surface or for heavy maintenance of earth roads. With respect to a corps of efficient highway engineers, there is absolutely no reason to expect the Federal Government to reach 380,000 miles of road with an efficient corps of engineers to expend at the most $120 per mile. If engineering were to be estimated at 3 per cent, the engineering supervision could amount to but $3.60 per mile for roads of the highest class, on which the joint fund would amount to $120. It is true that probably over 50 per cent of this fund of $25,000,000 would be raised by indirect taxation on city communities, but because of its thin distribution it will not have the effect which has resulted from State aid from the same cause. With reference to the educational influence which will result from the expenditure on highways in the three classes in question little can be expected.

The Government will inevitably be expected to establish the standard for road work when once Government money is available; actually, however, the standard will be determined largely by local authorities. It is estimated that there has been spent since 1904 by local road officials over $1,000,000,000 on local roads. This money has been spent largely by men who have had no opportunity for training and who held office, at most, but two or three years, on an average. The stimulating and educational effect of scientifically built roads or scientifically maintained roads can scarcely be expected from the expenditure provided for the three classes of post roads.

By granting this aid to local roads in this form the Government indorses most emphatically the system of local road management which has so long prevailed, and which has undoubtedly resulted in the waste of millions of dollars.

It is certainly interesting in considering the probable effect of the measure proposed in section 4 to try to imagine what would have been the result had the $160,000,000 which has been expended during the past 20 years by State highway departments been distributed on the same basis. As a matter of fact, there never was a systematic road movement in this country until the establishment of the State-aid plan for road building. There has resulted from the expenditure of $160,000,000 under this State-aid plan a total mileage of first-class improved roads which is now estimated at 25,000 miles.

It would seem that the bonus per mile offered by this bill is entirely insufficient to stimulate an expenditure which would be necessary to bring the average road of any class into a condition where the added Federal money would be of visible effect. But to increase the expenditure per mile under the proposed plan of local supervision on the job would but add to the waste that must inevitably follow.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HAMMOND].

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it seems to me that there are two distinct propositions in this bill. The first proposition is one to make good roads. Those roads are to be constructed under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture and the State authorities. I am in favor of that part of the bill. But section 4 provides simply a measure of the amount of money to be paid each year by the United States Government to the various States. You may call it rental, if you please. You may classify the roads, but when you get down to the bottom of the plan you are simply providing that each year the United States Government shall pay to the States a certain amount of money to be measured by the amount of money the States are expending upon certain roads within their limits. There is no provision for making better roads. Let any amount be expended upon the roads and an equal amount is contributed.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HAMMOND] is certainly mistaken about there being no provision in the bill to make a road better. The fact is that the bill carries provisions all the way through that no money can be had by the States until the roads are constructed according to specifications prepared by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. HAMMOND. Under section 4 the roads are not constructed according to the specifications of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The bill itself prescribes a standard.

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes; the bill says, for instance, as to dirt roads, that they shall not be steeper than necessary; that they shall be fairly well drained; and that there shall be ditches along the sides.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That they shall be "adequately drained" and there shall be ample side ditches.

Mr. HAMMOND. That is the way road work is done when there is any road work done at all.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Where there is no road work at all we propose to have some done.

Mr. HAMMOND. You propose to pay out of the Treasury a certain sum of money, and that amount of money is to be measured by the amount of money expended on the roads within the States.

Mr. SAUNDERS. May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. HAMMOND. Certainly.

Mr. SAUNDERS. It is just this, as a business proposition: Any road, no matter where it is located in the State, that is kept up to the specifications prescribed in section C will be a first-class road, will it not? Any road that you may select that is kept up to the standard prescribed in section C will be a No. 1 dirt road, will it not?

Mr. HAMMOND. I would not say it would be a No. 1 dirt road. I would say it would be a fairly good road.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HAMMOND] has expired.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAMMOND. Is it too late to move an amendment to section 4?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. There is an amendment pending now.

Mr. HAMMOND. Then I move that section 4 be stricken from the bill, but leaving in section 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the bill by striking out all of section 4.

Mr. BORLAND. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BORLAND. I understand a motion to strike out takes precedence over a motion to substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the committee has a perfect right to perfect the section by amendment, if they desire, by striking out.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman's motion will be pending to be voted on.

I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CARR].

Mr. CARR. Mr. Chairman, this measure, looking to the improvement of the public highways of the United States, should have the support of the entire membership of this House. Those who have discussed the bill now under consideration have announced their interest in the cause of good roads. Thus we are all agreed on the end to be attained, but we seem to be divided as to the best means of accomplishing that end. I do not regard this bill as the best that could be prepared, but it is a step in the right direction. There are those who will support it who do not believe it is even a fairly good bill, but who do believe in the general proposition of national aid in the construction and maintenance of highways. A constitutional provision gives Congress the right to establish post offices and post roads, and Congress having established post roads, in the constitutional sense, by designating certain highways over which the mail shall be carried, is in duty bound to assist in their maintenance.

Mr. Chairman, there is another important matter presented by this bill. The reason that we do not have good roads in this country is not due to the lack of money to construct them nor the unwillingness of the people to tax themselves, and heavily, too, for that purpose. Reports have been read during this discussion showing that not more than 20 per cent of the money raised for good-roads purposes ever reaches the roads; that 80 per cent of it is lost somewhere in the process of administration. Of this 20 per cent that does finally reach the roads, some of it is lost either by reason of ignorance in road building or the negligence of those charged with this work. From my own observation I am inclined to believe that the chief trouble arises from our inability to construct good roads. Many of our highways were constructed for political exploitation. I have heard sundry and divers arguments for appropriations for intermittent creeks for political navigation, and I have concluded that many of our highways are justified upon much the same ground.

A few years ago the State of Pennsylvania constructed at great expense many miles of what it termed good roads. Some of them stood the traffic fairly well, but many of them are now worn out and are practically useless. Either the system of road building was at fault, or the roads were not constructed in accordance with the system. I watched several of these roads building. I noticed that the foundation was prepared with great care. Huge stones formed these foundations. Then came a layer of smaller ones, then a layer of gravel, and each course or layer of a lighter material until the surface was reached. Such roads would not stand rains, heavy hauling, nor automobile traffic. It seemed to me that they had been constructed upside down. What we need are roads that will stand the traffic. Shortly after this experience, Mr. Chairman, the legislature submitted a proposition to the people of Pennsylvania to raise $50,000,000 for the purpose of building roads. It was defeated by an overwhelming vote, not that the people did not desire good roads, nor that they were unwilling to provide the funds necessary for their construction, but their experience in road building had been too expensive to permit a repetition. I am also inclined to the belief that they did not have sufficient faith in the crowd who expected to spend this money. But whatever the reason the proposed scheme went down to defeat.

In opening his address in this debate the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] stated that there were approximately 2,250,000 miles of public highways in the United States, and that to put these highways in first-class condition would cost approximately $45,000,000,000. This would mean about $20,000 for each of the 2,250,000 miles of road in the United States. When the gentleman from Missouri was reciting these stupendous figures I wondered what proportion of that $45,000,000,000 the people of the United States have, as a matter of fact, already expended for good-road purposes. This would be hard to estimate, and yet I have no doubt that if the money that has been raised for good-road purposes had been honestly expended and the proper system of road building adopted we would now have fairly good highways in this country.

Then, too, Mr. Chairman, we have too many roads in the United States to be maintained. As the commerce of the Nation increases these roads may all in time be necessary, but many of them are not necessary now. I have in mind a certain township in the county in which I live. This township has an area of about 15 square miles, and yet it has 160 miles of public road. This is an average of the number of miles of road in many sections of Pennsylvania and other Eastern States. It is obviously impossible by any reasonable system of taxation to maintain in first-class condition so much roadway; consequently the more important highways of travel must suffer in order that the less important ones may have a share of the taxes raised for road support.

One of the pressing problems of the present is that which relates to the high cost of living. The economic distribution of the varied products of this wonderful land of ours is a matter closely allied with this great question. The cost of transportation is the vital element in the cost of production. The farmer gets no more than a fair return, and sometimes not even that, for his products, but when they reach the consumer the original cost has frequently more than doubled. The explanation lies in the added cost of transportation. It costs the farmers of this country on an average of 23 cents a mile to haul a ton of farm products to market. Suppose the average haul is 12 miles—and this is not too high, taking the country as a whole—here is a cost of yearly $3 to market a ton of produce. But 10 per cent of the roads in this country are improved, and it has been shown conclusively that improved roads would reduce the cost of the average haul from $3 to $1 per ton. What an enormous saving this would mean to the consumer! These advantages might be multiplied many times. Nothing enters so much into the life of this Nation as the question of transportation, and the great volume of the business of the Nation passes over its public highways.

Mr. Chairman, the postal business of this country is now self-sustaining. This Government can well afford to help maintain these highways, as the postal revenues flow into the National Treasury. The rural communities should not be asked to build and maintain highways for the carrying of mails while the Government receives the revenues. National aid in good-road building should have the cooperation of us all.

Mr. Chairman, these are some of the considerations that lead me to support this bill. As I have before stated, it is in many respects defective. What these defects are have been discussed at some length by others. I hope at a later time to call your attention to some of them as I see them. But this measure will mark a beginning, and once the good work is begun we may look hopefully forward to the day when our dream of good roads throughout the Nation will have become a reality. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have not looked with favor on the policy of having the Federal Government make appropriations for highway construction within the States. I believe that it is not only the privilege but the duty of the States to look after local means of communication, and I am not in favor of doing anything which will detract from the dignity and importance of the States and transfer their obligations to the Federal Government. I have not favored this policy, because as an earnest advocate of the good-roads movement I believe that it will have a tendency to kill the movement. I do not believe that there is in this House a more sincere advocate of the policy of improving the roads than I am. I merely differ from some of my colleagues as to the manner in which that improvement shall be brought about. I favor what I believe to be the less expensive and more efficient system of having the roads constructed by the States, counties, and communities, and under local supervision by means of appropriations made by the people themselves in the shape of bond issues and voluntarily assumed taxes. In that way those communities which need the roads and have the enterprise and courage to go after them will get them and the backward, indolent, and unenterprising people will wait until their energies have been aroused.

For 20 years I have been an earnest and active supporter of every project looking to the betterment of the highways which has commended itself to my judgment as a practical and economical scheme. My enthusiasm has been so great that I have gone over my own State, at my own expense, addressing mass meetings and urging the people to tax themselves for the construction of roads. My own county in the last 10 years has spent a million and a half dollars in highway improvement, and it has been well spent.

I firmly believe, however, that once we begin the policy of Federal appropriations for highways no State, no county, and no community within a county will again willingly undertake such a work for itself.

The tendency is now, whenever any locality wants anything done, to appeal to Washington for an appropriation out of the Federal Treasury. This is done upon the theory that what comes from the Federal Treasury is not an expense borne by the people themselves. Some people may believe that, some people do believe it, but there is not a man in this House who does not know that all these outlays are a charge upon taxes paid by the people, on the taxes that are expensively collected; and the people not only meet all these charges, but they pay dearly for the transfer of the obligation from the States to the Federal Union. I believe that any county and any community can build such roads as they need for less than two-thirds of what the same roads will cost when constructed by the Federal Government, and as a man of moderate prudence I would never advise the purchase of anything for a dollar and a half when one can get it for a dollar. It is so generally known and admitted that the Federal Government is extravagant—that its expenditures are not looked after with a spirit of economy—that it is not necessary for me to press that point on your attention. Simply to say that a thing is being done by the Government is equivalent to saying it is being done expensively.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I can not yield. It is quite impossible in the time allotted to me.

I also believe that when this work is done under local direction it will not only cost less but that results will be better.

I am willing to meet any reasonable outlay for the construction of highways when the expenditure is made by the proper political organization and when the work is well done. We can not have too many good roads, and we are not likely to have roads that are too good. But we are doing very well now in the matter of road improvement in the United States. I have been informed that the people of this country are now expending approximately a million dollars a day in this line of work. That seems to me to be enough.

If we begin this policy of Federal appropriation and there is a resultant paralysis of local effort, as I confidently expect will be the case, we will have begun what, in my judgment, marks the beginning of an era of extravagance without parallel in the history of our Government. [Applause.]

There are some features of the bill which I do not like. I dare say it was drawn adroitly enough with the view of getting votes for it, but to distribute this proposed appropriation of $25,000,000 on the basis of population is not fair, because we can have and we do have, as in New York, for example, a congestion of population in a limited area. Under the terms of this bill the city of New York, which needs no roads, would, based on the population scheme of division, be entitled to receive more money out of the Federal Treasury than the whole State of Texas. On the theory that one-half of this $25,000,000 shall be distributed in proportion to the population and one-half in proportion to the total number of miles of roads, New York, which has an area of only 49,170 square miles, would receive nearly a million dollars more than Texas, which has an area of 265,000 square miles. Ohio, which has an area of only 41,060 square miles, would receive a quarter of a million more than the State of Texas, with its 265,000 square miles. Even Massachusetts, which only has 8,315 square miles, and is not much bigger than one or two of the counties in western Texas, would receive nearly half as much as the State of Texas.

It is proposed to expend each year out of this appropriation on each mile of the class A, or first class, roads the sum of $60. On each mile of the second-class roads $30 and on each mile of the third-class roads the sum of $15. As the great bulk of the roads in the South and West would be of class C, or the third class, they would get only $15 per mile. Does any man seriously believe or contend that an expenditure of $15 a mile by the Federal Government, plus a like sum to be expended by the State, will even make a showing in the way of maintenance to roads? The suggestion is absurd.

These, sir, are a few reasons why I have not been in favor of this bill. I want to say distinctly and again that I believe in the development of the highways; that I have never been hostile to such an improvement for a moment, and I repudiate the suggestion that I am not as friendly to this work as any man in this House, but my judgment will not permit me to subscribe to the scheme which is proposed.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, there are two reasons why I am opposed to this bill. To begin with, I do not think the provisions of the bill concerning the expenditure of the money are either fair or scientific. But I am not going to argue that particular point this morning.

There is another reason why I am opposed to this bill—a reason which should appeal to every Member of this House, and particularly to every Democrat. When the revenue bill was reported at the beginning of the special session the Ways and Means Committee estimated that the revenue from the new tariff law and the income tax would give us about $18,000,000 above the estimated expenses of the Government. Now, there are two facts that have happened since that time that we are sure of. The first is that the estimated receipts from the Government are going to be less than were estimated by the Ways and Means Committee.

The second fact, which this House is proving every day, is that the estimated expenditures for the next fiscal year were altogether too low. Every general appropriation bill that will be reported and passed by this House will be above the estimates furnished by the Ways and Means Committee. We have already passed the Lever agricultural extension bill, which provides for an expenditure of $25,000,000. This bill provides for an expenditure of $25,000,000 more. The increases in the general appropriation bills that are coming later will take up every cent of that $18,000,000, and the real objection to this bill at this time is that you have not the money. [Applause.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Lever bill does not contemplate an expenditure of more than $4,800,000 at the end of 10 years. It does not carry $25,000,000, as the gentleman stated.

Mr. ASWELL. Will the gentleman please state what fact has developed that leads him to think that the revenues will be less than they were estimated to be? What is the fact?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. The revenues from the tariff law since it has been in force are less than were estimated by the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. ASWELL. What is the gentleman's authority?

Mr. LANGLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I wish to say that the figures show that the revenues are not as much as were estimated. The gentleman could easily answer that, and he could further reply that we on this side of the House told the gentleman that that would be so. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I have not the figures at hand, Mr. Chairman, but I understand it is a fact that the revenues are less than they were estimated to be, and it is an absolute fact that the expenditures are greater.

Now, a word as to the political considerations. This bill appeals to every man who is in favor of good roads. It appeals to every man who wants the support of his constituents. I have the honor to represent a rural community with a great many rural routes in it. If this bill were passed, we could go back to our homes and say to our constituents, "We have brought back so many thousands of dollars to be expended here for your benefit." That would be a great help to the individual Congressman seeking reelection. But, gentlemen, if you go back home to your constituents with a chunk of pork in one hand and a $50,000,000 deficit in the other hand, you will find it entirely different. [Applause.]

I yield back, Mr. Chairman, the remainder of my time.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, did the gentleman yield back any time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had one minute remaining.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HAMMOND] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] use some time? I am down to five minutes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] is recognized for five minutes.

[Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY].

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I have been sitting at this table for two days listening to the same objections that we heard presented and discussed around the table of the committee before we reported this bill. I believe there has not been a criticism made that was not in the mind of the committee that had charge of this matter. We do not claim that this bill is perfect. We realize the fact that there are necessarily some features of injustice and inequality in it, but we have considered all of those things and have tried to present a bill that would have the least unfairness in it and would come the nearest to being workable. We started out on the broad proposition that this question is a national one. We have in this country the best system of railroads, and we have the best system of many things that are to be found anywhere in the world, but everybody admits that our roads are the poorest of any first-class nation in the world, and therefore it becomes a national duty to encourage this sort of internal improvement.

We started upon the second proposition, that under the policy of this Government since its foundation a large part of the money collected from the people at large has been spent in the cities and for the benefit of the city dwellers, and we felt that the time had honestly and fairly arrived when the men who have paid more than half the taxes of this country should have the largest part of this fund spent not only for their indirect benefit, but spent for their direct benefit, and spent among them.

During this discussion there have been many frequent references to what is called the "pork barrel." I undertake to say that there never was a measure presented to this House that was as free from that charge. [Applause.] We have so framed it that no Congressman can go home and say that he controls this much money. If an appropriation is made for some public building in his district or for the improvement of some harbor in his district, then he can go home and lay that down to his people and say, "I brought you this"; but he can not go into his State now under this bill and say, "I brought this to my district." All that he can say is, "The people of the United States as a whole have seen fit to make an appropriation for the benefit of the agricultural portion of this country, in which I had a small part." [Applause.]

The last gentleman who spoke against this bill referred to the fact that a Member may go home and make that as a plea for reelection. Have you ever thought what a small amount you would have for your particular district and what a small amount of pork you would carry home? How would that look in comparison with the pork barrel that the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. WICKERSHAM] will take home, $40,000,000 in his one district, while all over the United States, divided among more than 400 Members, there will be only the pitiful sum of $25,000,000.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PROUTY. I refuse to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. PROUTY. Now, referring to some of the specific criticisms that have been made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], they can be easily understood when you understand the sentiment that controls him. At the very threshold of this discussion we met two contending forces, one of them in favor of appropriating a large amount of money from the Public Treasury for the construction of national highways, without any reference to the men who haul their products from the farm to the city, but for the specific purpose of creating what my friend [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] calls "peacock boulevards." We met that all the way through.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] appeared before our committee and made one of the prettiest speeches I ever heard him make, in which he tried to get us to appropriate this money for building a national highway that led through his city over the Santa Fe trail. [Applause.] And I am fair in saying that the gentleman is not here opposing this bill and offering these amendments for any other purpose than to create enough discord here to defeat the bill, simply because he did not get his peacock alley put through his town. [Laughter and applause.] That is what it was, a peacock alley, upon which these fellows would show themselves constantly. [Laughter.]

The special objection that the gentleman offers, that this does not build any highways, but simply expends the money on highways already built, grows out of the fact that the gentleman constantly confuses, either intentionally or ignorantly, the provisions of section 3 and section 4. Section 3 expressly provides for the construction and maintenance of even the kind of roads that he is advocating.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman was discussing the bill and I wanted to answer him.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the bill before us for the improvement of the roads of the country. One of my colleagues when addressing the House a few moments ago was asked whether he did not represent a country district, the intimation being that only the country districts were interested in this legislation.

I wish to say that I represent a city district and am for the bill, and always have been for good roads. Not only do I represent a city district, but Baltimore contains about half the population of the entire State of Maryland and pays probably more than half of all the State taxes, and yet the people of my district and city have always been in favor of the construction of good roads.

Mr. McCOY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I can not yield. After I get through I will.

Mr. SLAYDEN. After your time has expired? [Laughter.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am proud to say that my people have never looked upon internal improvements in a narrow and niggardly way, but upon a broad and comprehensive scale. In the olden days when railroads first began, it was the splendid Commonwealth of Maryland and the city of Baltimore which gave them an impetus by loans and appropriations; and when canal builders were busy, it was the State of Maryland who took her chances with other bond and stock holders. It was she whose shoulders were always at the wheel to help build up a great State and a great Nation. May I be allowed to digress a little and say that when the clouds of the impending War of 1812 hovered over the land it was the merchants of the city of Baltimore who came to the front and gave $3,000,000 to the National Government for defense of the Nation? And this loan later assumed by the city became the first and the foundation of our municipal debt. In 1814, at Fort McHenry and North Point, near Baltimore, her people rushed to the rescue, repulsed the enemy, and turned the tide of the war.

I might go on citing instances in the history of my people to show that she has ever believed in the greatest good to the greatest number, and that what helps the country people is bound to help those of the city.

In my State we have two systems. In 1904 I represented a city legislative district in the House of Delegates of Maryland and voted for a system by which the State appropriated $200,000 a year and the counties made up an additional $200,000 per year, and that money was payable to each and every county according to the road mileage. We have constructed something like 200 miles of good roads in our State under that system. It has worked admirably, and I can not help but notice the similarity between the system established in Maryland in 1904 and the provisions of this bill which we of this House are about to pass.

Mr. McCOY. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I can not.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I want to say that we are working under the same system with happy results in Virginia.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am glad the gentleman so states. In 1908 we found that the system of 1904, where the State appropriated $200,000 a year and the counties a like sum, did not build up the main arteries of the road system, but was most beneficial in building up the local roads, and therefore in 1908, when a member of the State senate, it was my pleasure to vote for a bill authorizing the issue of bonds so that we might build the main arteries to and from the city of Baltimore, the county seats, and connecting with the road systems of other States so that we might eventually have a splendid interstate system of highways.

We have at various times issued bonds for some $9,000,000 and have laid out about twelve hundred miles of roads to be improved, of which more than 450 miles have been completed at an average cost of slightly less than $10,000 per mile. We are ready to push the work this spring, and ere long our State will have completed as fine a system of improved roads as can be found in the land and with ample provision for their maintenance. We are not very large but are mighty, and we make every dollar count. In addition to that, we have constructed from this, the National Capital, to the city of Baltimore as fine a boulevard as can be built, part of it macadam and part cement. I have no doubt many of you gentlemen have tested its merit on many occasions. There has also been constructed aside from the general road system an equally fine boulevard from Annapolis, the State capital, to Baltimore, and we are constantly building good roads, and the district which I represent is constantly paying taxes toward the interest on the bonds and toward this annual appropriation of $200,000, and no one in that district has complained about it so far as I am informed.

Mr. McCOY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. In a moment. We believe that a system of good roads in the State is beneficial not only to the counties, not only to the farmers, not only to those who live outside and adjacent to the city, but we believe that when we build these good roads we build in the interest of the various sections of our State, and what helps enrich one section will help all. Now I will yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. McCOY. I wanted to ask the gentleman whether the fact that Baltimore County has spent so much money in the country accounts for the bad roads in the city of Baltimore? [Laughter.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Well, Mr. Chairman, as far as the city of Baltimore is concerned, we are expending millions of dollars in the improvement of that city. We are expending $25,000,000 in the construction of sewers and over $10,000,000 in laying good streets, but we can not lay the improved streets until we complete the sewers under the streets. [Applause.]

I am glad the gentleman from New Jersey wants to know about Baltimore. It awakens me to the necessity of saying something of that beautiful and historic city on the banks of the Patapsco.

For many years our city streets were mostly paved with cobblestones, because we did not wish to undertake the laying of the improved streets until we had solved the sewage problem; and let me say that this is no easy task for an established city of some 600,000 people. Not alone was the expense involved a problem, but the disposition of the sewage as well. It could not be dumped into the river on account of the fishing industry. We had to construct great pumps and an immense disposal plant. This, as I have said, will cost the city at least $25,000,000, and the property owners no less than that much more. This system is now nearly completed, and under the administration of an energetic and untiring mayor the improved streets are rapidly following the sewers, so that in a few years we will have one of the most modern cities in this country, and certainly the finest sewerage system in the world, and all this within 10 years from Sunday last—February 8—when the great conflagration swept the entire business section of our city out of existence.

Not many years ago I had one of the Members of this House over to Baltimore with me, and I was apologizing for the condition of our streets, when he turned on me and said: "Go along about your streets. I am not looking at the streets; I am looking at your beautiful women." Why could not my friend have done likewise.

Mr. Chairman, I desire now to return to the bill before us after having told you some few things about the city of Baltimore.

This bill provides for the expenditure of not over $25,000,000 in any one year for the construction and maintenance of post roads. It provides an equitable manner of distributing this fund. This is to be done upon two very reasonable bases. One-half of the sum of money which any State receives from the Government shall be computed in the relation its population bears to the population of the whole country. The other one-half is to be computed from the relation the miles of rural roads in any State shall bear to the whole number of miles of rural roads in the United States. These together shall constitute the amount that any State shall receive under this plan in any year.

Section 3 provides, among other things, that this sum may be expended in a half-and-half plan, and this, as I have said before, constitutes its similarity to the first system adopted in the State of Maryland. The State to which it is given shall contribute at least one-half the money so expended upon its highways, but the expenditure is limited to the rural-route roads, or this money, or any part of it, may at the option of the State be expended under the provisions of section 4, which defines the different classes of roads and fixes a standard for their construction and also provides payment of a certain sum as a rental for each class, provided, however, that they must be kept up to that standard.

In all of the States there were in operation on December 1, 1913, 42,961 rural routes, with an aggregate length of 1,042,477 miles, or an average length of 24.27 miles for each route. At the same time there were 12,257 star routes, with an aggregate length of 156,477 miles, an average of 12.76 miles for each star route.

The estimated number of miles of highways in the United States is 2,250,000 miles, of which 416,888 miles are used as post roads. This bill divides these post roads into three classes, to wit:

Class A. All waterbound macadam roads or roads with a more expensive or more durable surface, 52,585 miles.

Class B. All roads built of gravel, shell, or proper combination of sand and clay, 161,790 miles.

Class C. All improved earth roads with adequate side drains, compacted, with crown smooth surface and well maintained, 222,513 miles.

Class A will be entitled under this bill to $60 per mile per annum, class B to $30 per mile, and class C to $15 per mile. Objection has been made to this bill because the best improved roads are to receive the most money. I believe the bill is right. The people who have expended the most to improve their highways should receive more encouragement than the less improved roads. Federal aid along this line will be an incentive to build more of class A roads.

I have seen the farmers haul their products to market on both the pikes and dirt roads. On the average pike one team will haul from one and a half to two tons, make an average trip of 20 miles, and return in one day. On the dirt roads one team will haul, on an average, from one-half to three-fourths of a ton, make an average trip of 10 miles, and return in one day. Therefore, on this calculation, which is a fair one, it costs the man on the dirt road four times what it costs the man on the pike to market his products, which is conclusive proof that the mud tax is the greatest, most excessive, and most burdensome tax that the farmer pays, and as it is a well-known fact that the ultimate consumer bears all the burden, this mud tax must eventually be paid by him. So in view of the fact that the life of the Nation is dependent upon the success of the farm, can any man contend that it is not economical and that it is not profitable for the Government to expend money in the construction and maintenance of roads into and through the farming sections? The man who would make such contention is ignorant of the interest the city has, or should have, in the success of the farm.

We have been told that our great cities are merely the product of our agricultural resources. Our gold mines furnish us with a medium of exchange for the products of agriculture and manufactures. The factories change the products of field and forest to articles for the comfort of man. The progress and prosperity of our land must naturally stand upon the innumerable acres of the Union, and the great farm products produced upon this vast acreage is the great backbone of all common wealth and enterprise. Good roads reduce the cost of transportation from at least 28 cents per ton-mile to 8 cents. The experience of my State has been that where good roads are constructed property is increased in value. The taxable basis of the State is increased, the result being a great benefit to the producer, the miner, and the taxpayer. We can not separate the interests of those of the city, who earn their living by labor and manufacture from those of the country who produce the wherewithal upon which they live. We can not improve our roads without lessening the expense of transportation of the farm, and this lessened expense will eventually lessen the cost to the ultimate consumer. So with each and all of us, whether residents of teeming cities or of the country districts, good roads are of inestimable value.

There is also another phase of the subject which I think is of vast importance to the people of our State. That is the "educational benefits" derived from good roads. I have always believed, from the time when I was a public-school teacher in my native State, that better advantages can be obtained by having large graded schools; and by the assistance of good roads we may be able to organize the several public schools into groups and merge these groups into central schools. The good roads will enable us to have well-equipped wagons, or perhaps motor vehicles, by which to convey the children from their several sections to the central school. In this way the country people will get the same advantages as those the city now enjoy. This system would insure the regular attendance of the children and their continued interest in the school, and would, no doubt, prove a marvelous success in their education. I believe that the education of the children of the country districts is just as important to the people of Baltimore and other large cities as any other one thing, because it is a well-known fact that many of the country children become inhabitants of the large cities and take an active part in the general welfare and the industrial pursuits and professions of their adopted home.

Better roads mean cheaper transportation. Cheaper transportation means cheaper foodstuffs and living. The farmer feeds the people. What benefits the farmer benefits those who work in the factory, the shops, the thousands and tens of thousands who live in towns and cities. Why improve the rivers and harbors and not improve the great highways of the land over which must be transported the wheat, the corn, the cotton, the cattle and hogs, and every article we eat and wear? The Government collects its revenue from all of the people and all of the people should receive the same fair consideration and return.

A few days ago one of my colleagues asked me why I, a resident of a city district, was so interested in good roads. I replied that I had from boyhood been so interested, and recited to him how, when I was a boy, I attended public school in the city of Baltimore, which was only 6 miles from my home in the country. It was necessary for my brother, now Dr. Linthicum, of Baltimore, and I to go to the city each Monday morning and come home on Friday after school. On many such occasions the roads were so bad during the winter that it was impossible to drive a carriage over them, and we had at such times to stand up in one of the carts belonging to my father and driven by "Uncle Robert," and in that way journey from our home to the city with mud nearly to the axles; and whenever I hear of the building of good roads I can not but feel that it is the greatest benefit which we can confer upon our people. I am therefore heartily in favor of the passage of this bill and sincerely hope it may soon become a law.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, this bill is only carrying out a pledge made by the Democratic Party to the people in its platform adopted at Baltimore in July, 1912. The platform on this subject reads as follows:

> We favor national aid to State and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post roads.

The people of my district and of my State are enthusiastic on the subject of good roads. The people of Arkansas have always known, and now the people of the whole country are beginning to understand and know, that Arkansas is a State possessed of wonderful resources. Considering our rich cotton and corn lands, our waving fields of rice, our mineral deposits, our great peach and apple orchards, our timberlands, and with more waterways than any other State, we feel that we can fully and justly make the claim that no Commonwealth is so blessed with nature's wealth, and now with good roads, which will finally come with such aid and encouragement as we may expect under the provisions of this bill, if it becomes a law, will make the people of this country, especially those who live on the farms, prosperous and happy, because it will lighten the burden of the farmer in getting his products to the market and will benefit the dwellers in the towns and cities who consume the products because the cost of transportation will be lessened. This bill is a great step taken in a direction long wished for by the people, and which, in my judgment, will ultimately lead to more extensive improvements on our public highways, and thereby and by reason thereof will develop our great farming sections, and especially in the West and South. If there were no great agricultural South and no great agricultural West, what would be the effect on the people of the great Northern and Eastern States? To ask the question is to answer it. These Southern and Western States represent the greatest agricultural regions in the world, and with good roads traversing them our farmers will become stimulated, young men will abandon the towns and congested cities in a large degree and seek homes on the farm and become tillers of the soil; and when such roads are constructed and maintained the man who is already engaged in agricultural pursuits will no longer dream of taking his family to dwell in the city. Good roads will bring the city and the country into closer relation.

The Government expends yearly large sums of money in the building of battleships and improvements of various kinds and for other purposes, but until this blessed day the Government has never before taken a direct step to bring itself to the construction of highways for the benefit of that great class of our fellow citizens who feed and clothe the people of this country. I promised the people of the district which I have the honor to represent on this floor that when I took my seat in Congress I would urge legislation in the way of Federal aid in the construction of post highways, and in voting for the bill I am but keeping faith with the people.

The bill carries an appropriation of $25,000,000. The system of roads such as is contemplated will make rural life more attractive and happy and will have a great bearing upon the economic, intellectual, and social welfare of the people, and a condition of greater activity and cooperation in this great question will spring up in the rural districts in this country, resulting in an era, in my judgment, of the greatest prosperity. I believe this to be true, for the reason that the people back home believe in it and believe also that their condition will be improved and blessed.

I find on this floor that men like myself, who are fresh from the people and fresh from agricultural districts, and a great many of whom are farmers, are standing for this bill because they believe that it is in demand in rural life; that is, that it will help the producer and the farmer. Not only will it help him in marketing his products and cheapening the cost of transportation to market, but with good roads the farmer can take his wife and children and quickly visit the town and go to church, either in town or country, from a long distance, and enjoy life with his loved ones the same as those domiciled in the city. It has been said on this floor that with good roads cost of transportation by wagon can be lessened from 50 to 75 per cent, and will also reduce the cost of production, resulting ultimately in reducing the now high cost of living.

Railroads can carry freight, a ton, from 150 to 200 miles for $1.25, while it costs to carry the same ton on a wagon 5 miles $1.25, and over a good road the cost of such transportation should not be more than 25 cents. This $25,000,000 is appropriated for the first year apportioned among the States that desire to participate by making appropriations in like amount in proportion to their population and total miles of rural post roads.

It is provided that the Secretary of Agriculture, in dealing with this proposition, may exercise the powers conferred upon him to deal with State officials charged with the control of public highways, and to designate roads, and to determine the manner of construction and maintenance.

Under this bill a State may elect at its option to receive its pro rata from the National Government to be expended on a system of post roads, as is set out in sections 3 and 4, or probably under both. If the State accepts under section 3, then under its lawful authority it will act with the Secretary of Agriculture in agreeing upon the roads to be improved, and the Secretary of Agriculture may require all proper inspection and maintenance. The roads will be placed in classifications called A, B, and C.

Class A is a macadam road, or its equivalent, properly constructed, graded, and so forth. As aid for this kind of a road the Government will contribute out of the State apportionment $60 per mile.

Class B is a gravel, shell, or combination of sand and clay road, or its equivalent, properly graded and constructed, toward which the Government will contribute out of the State apportionment $30 per mile.

Class C is a graded road, well drained, constructed so as to shed water, and kept crowned and compacted by dragging, toward which the Government will contribute $15 per mile.

The State or civil subdivision thereof shall expend in the construction, maintenance, or extension of any such roads an amount equal to the amount paid by the United States.

In order to show the maximum amount of Federal aid under this bill, I illustrate by reference to the States of Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, and California.

State.	Per cent of total population.	Amount.	Per cent of total star and rural routes.	Amount.	Total.
Alabama	2.34	$292,500	2.29	$286,250	$578,750
Arizona	.22	27,500	.22	27,500	55,000
Arkansas	1.72	215,000	1.39	173,750	388,750
California	2.60	352,000	1.43	178,750	503,750

I also show a list of the same States showing the number of aggregate length of rural and star routes in operation December 1, 1913.

States.	Rural service.		Star service.
	Number of routes.	Aggregate length.	Number of routes.	Aggregate length.
		Miles.		Miles.
Alabama	1,040	24,688	282	2,850.88
Arizona	14	332	84	2,344.21
Arkansas	460	10,608	598	6,684.90
California	408	9,462	421	7,999.66

As I understand the bill the Government will not aid a State, except it is prepared to contribute a like amount; to be plain, to match dollars with the Government; that is, in so far as it relates to the actual building and construction of roads, but under sections 3 and 4 of the bill the Government may contribute each year to roads now or hereafter constructed, either by improvement districts or otherwise, for maintenance and upkeep, $60 per mile as to the roads mentioned in class A, $30 per mile as to the roads described in class B, and $15 per mile as to the roads designated in class C, whether the States match dollars with the Government or not, provided these roads be acceptable to the Secretary of Agriculture as being adapted to use by the United States as rural post roads.

The bill, Mr. Chairman, does not entirely meet with my approval, neither do I believe that it exactly meets the approval of any Member of this House; but it being a new question, and the committee who framed the bill and the House considering it are now but pioneers in this great movement, time will teach the people the exact changes that should be made, and the Congress in obedience to their call may amend so as to make it equitable and correct. But the movement in the direction of good roads for the people in this country is the controlling thought, and our countrymen must understand that no new law enacted upon a new subject was ever in the beginning perfectly worked out.

For a few years it may be somewhat disappointing, even to its best friends, but the main subject will never be abandoned unless perchance it should be held to be unconstitutional by the courts, and this I do not believe can happen, for the reason that the Government has the right to aid in the building and maintaining of roads for Postal Service.

This good-roads proposition, Mr. Chairman, will be worked out in time, but the greatest thing I see in it is that the Government will be committed to the proposition of aiding in good roads throughout the country.

A great statesman once said:

The two greatest forces in the advancement of civilization are the schoolmaster and good roads.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that my friend from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY], who is usually so eminently fair, after he got through with his speech about the Peacock Boulevard, making me the goat, appealing to passion and prejudice to get the bill through, when he got down to the discussion of the bill declined to yield to me. When he got down to a discussion of the bill I wanted to ask him some questions about section 3 and section 4; but the undesirability of the provisions of the bill strongly appeals to me, and I will not ask him to yield.

Mr. PROUTY. If the gentleman will give me a minute of his time, I will answer any questions.

Mr. BORLAND. I regret that I am unable to do so, as I have promised all my time to others. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, we have been considering this bill for some time, and I was rather curious to know why some amendments that have been offered on the floor of the House—and if adopted would have greatly improved the bill—were not considered more seriously. I made some inquiry, and was told by a gentleman on the floor of this House who is rather close to the members of this great committee that we were to pass this bill in some form, send it to another body, where Senator BANKHEAD had a bill that provided for a highway commission, and that in that form this bill would come back here, and that we would then pass that bill.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I can not yield. I think the gentleman from Minnesota struck the keynote when he said that section 4 of this bill is vitally bad. I have no objection to section 3, which provides for building good roads, but section 4 provides for a scheme whereby the States can reach their hands into the pockets of the Federal Treasury and take out $25,000,000 a year and not expend a dollar of it on the roads that they have scheduled to the Secretary of Agriculture they would improve with the money so received. That is the proposition. Read what the bill states. It states that after the State gets the money it shall then be used during the ensuing year for the construction of these roads. I refer to the first lines of the paragraph on page 7. Then the bill proceeds to provide that if the States do not so expend the money, the next year those States shall not have any money from the Federal Treasury to improve those roads. There is no provision that it shall be paid back to the Treasury. Oh, no; that was not the intention. It provides that you can bunco the Government of the United States to the tune of $25,000,000 on certain roads one year, and when you want to bunco the Government again it must come back the next year with a different system of roads. I submit that this is wrong in principle and that this very obnoxious provision should be eliminated.

Then, take the classification. This classification of roads must have been arranged for the roads of Missouri. Take the three classifications, and they provide that they shall "embrace roads upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality."

Take the Ozark Mountains. Standing at the foot of the mountains we look up and see a trail crowned so as to shed the water, and so forth, and we want a Government appropriation to improve that so-called road. The grade from the foot to the top may be 45 degrees, but it is no steeper than is absolutely necessary to get to the top of the Ozark Mountains. [Laughter.] It is therefore within the specification of class C, and we are going to appropriate Government money and call it a post road. My colleague from Iowa wisely objected to the provision of the gentleman from Massachusetts that would define rural post roads. He wanted it to apply to the first section only, and his amendment was agreed to. Now, we have this condition: One section defines rural post roads, while the term in other sections is not defined. The Supreme Court of the United States has declared that a railway that carries mail is a post road, and if it runs through a rural community it must be a rural post road. Are we going to appropriate $25,000,000, a part of which can be used to improve railroads?

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I can not yield, for I have not the time. You are appropriating $25,000,000 by this bill, and a good deal of it will be expended under this section.

But you say that section 3 of the bill provides for a construction proposition of roads, and that section 4 provides for a maintenance proposition only; yet nobody but the members of the committee know that. The bill does not say so. Members of the committee have stated that over and over again. Section 3 provides—I read from the bill:

> For the construction, repair, and maintenance of rural post roads.

And section 4 provides—

> For the construction, maintenance, or extension of rural post roads.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] seems to be opposed to building a system of good roads in this country.

Mr. GOOD rose.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have not the time to yield.

Mr. GOOD. But the gentleman is not opposed to it.

Mr. HEFLIN. And he seeks to enlighten the House by telling us that they are going now to encourage the convict business in his State by giving a premium to those who enter the confines of an Iowa prison. They tell us how convicts work on the roads in Colorado without overseers and guards, and one would get the impression that it is really a pleasure to be a convict in Colorado, and a profitable business in Iowa where they pay a premium. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, this Government is paying $52,000,000 a year to the railroads of the country for carrying the mail. Does the gentleman want to put himself in the attitude of opposing an appropriation of $25,000,000 to all the country or dirt roads and highways among the 90,000,000 of people in this country? This is a good bill. There are features I would like to see changed in it, and probably there will be some changes made in the conference committee or in the Senate, but gentlemen who have had this bill in charge have thought it out, and they have carefully prepared a measure that provides for cooperation between the States and the Federal Government. Every district, every county, under this bill will receive aid. We want to build the highways that will reach from the marts of trade out into the remote places of the country, out to the farm—into communities off the railroad. I would like to see the pay per mile for the use of the rural routes—class A, $50; class B, $45; and class C, $40. This can be worked out in the committee on conference, and I think it will be. Under this bill jurisdiction over these roads remains with the State and local authorities. Twenty-five million dollars can not be better expended than in the project now in hand in this House. [Applause.]

Good roads benefit everybody. They enhance the value of property all around them and contribute to the comfort and happiness of the people generally. They bring the people of the country and the people of the town and city in close touch and easy communication. They enable the farmer to get his produce to the market in a shorter time and at less expense than is now the case. Often in the cotton marketing season in the South the roads in some sections are very bad and the farmer has a hard time reaching the market at all with his cotton. Especially is this true during the rainy season. With a fluctuating price, you can readily see that the farmer in the South would be vastly benefited by having roads in such condition that he could reach the market speedily when the price best suited him. The strain and wear on the farmer's teams and the breaking and mending of his wagons and the time that he loses all constitute a tremendous tax on the farmer.

Mr. Chairman, what the farmer needs is quick and easy access to the markets of the country, and this Congress can engage in no better work than that of aiding and encouraging the building of good roads in the various sections of the United States. [Applause.] I want to see the time come when our friends from the North, the East, and the West can come over these roads down into the heart of Dixie, the garden spot of the world. [Applause.] I want to see the time come when the American people will tour this country and visit the places of interest and historic importance before they go abroad. [Applause.] I want to see the great people of the East and West and North and South get better acquainted, drawn closer together by the bonds of a mutual interest, and nothing can be more conducive to that end than the construction of a splendid system of highways in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair state to the committee the amendment that is before it now?

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired, and the question before the committee is the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. LANGLEY. Let it be reported again.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. All time expires on the amendment only?

The CHAIRMAN. All time expires on the section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. DONOVAN. Was that the agreement, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. That was the agreement. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, may we have it again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be again reported.

Mr. MANN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HAMMOND] which has not yet been voted upon and which will now be voted upon if there be no further amendments to the section.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is there not an amendment pending which has been proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HAMMOND]?

The CHAIRMAN. That is true; but the gentleman from Minnesota has moved to strike out the entire section.

Mr. McKELLAR. My amendment is to perfect the section.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state for the information of the committee that the committee will first perfect the section before a motion to strike it out is put.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the committee does not oppose my amendment, and I now offer it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 1, page 7, strike out the last word "of" and insert in lieu thereof the word "in."
Line 2, page 7, strike out the word "designate" and insert in lieu thereof the word "indicate."
Line 3, page 7, insert, after the word "being," the word "lawfully."
Line 5, page 7, insert the following: "Provided, That this act shall not be construed as authorizing any governor to create any new office."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this bill. I was fortunate enough at the last session of Congress to have been one of those appointed on a committee to draft a roads bill which became a rider to the Post Office appropriation bill. However, the good-roads provision was defeated in the Senate. This bill is drawn along the same lines of the bill that was introduced and passed the House at the last session; but I believe this to be a more perfect bill than that was, because the most excellent Roads Committee which we have recently created has been able to give much greater care and attention and has devoted more time to it. I believe this new committee should be congratulated upon the splendid work it has done. At the last session I made an extended argument on the subject of good roads, and shall not take up the time of the House again on this subject at this time.

However, there is an amendment which I have offered and which I think should be adopted. The first paragraph on page 7 reads as follows:

That such payment shall be made to such officers of the respective States as the governor thereof shall designate as being entitled to receive the same by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn on him by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that this language may be construed as authorizing the governor of any State to designate any person he wishes as an "officer" to receive this money. If it is capable of this construction, then, in a State situated as my State of Tennessee is, having no road commission, the governor might designate an officer in each one of the 96 counties to receive this money. Inasmuch as road funds are handled by our county authorities and not by our State authorities, it would enable the governor to build up in a small way a political machine, because it would inevitably follow that these officers would be paid for their services in some way. I know it was not the intention of the framers of this bill to give, expressly or impliedly, the governors of the States any such authority. I know it was not the intention of the framers of this bill to permit the money being handled from the standpoint of politics. I believe it was the intention of the framers of the bill to provide, in those States which do not have a road commission, that the county officials having in charge the subject of roads should disburse this money, and that such county officials lawfully entitled to receive the same should be merely indicated to the Treasurer of the United States by the governor of each State.

Thus believing, Mr. Chairman, this to be the intention of those who have framed the bill, I have offered several amendments to this paragraph, and if the amendments should be adopted by the committee then the paragraph would read as follows:

That such payments shall be made to such officers in the respective States as the governors thereof shall indicate as being lawfully entitled to receive the same by the Treasurer of the United States upon warrants drawn upon him by the Secretary of Agriculture: Provided, however, that this act shall not be construed as authorizing any governor to create any new office.

This amendment, Mr. Chairman, will simply require the governor of a State to indicate to the Treasurer of the United States where there is no State road commission and where road work is now entirely done by county authorities which county official is entitled to receive the same, the sole duty of the governor being to indicate the lawfully authorized officer to receive the money. It will not give him any discretion, express or implied, to appoint any officer.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, section 4, page 6, by striking out all in line 13 after the colon, and all in line 14 and all in line 15 preceding the colon, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"For all roads which at the time of the passage of this act which shall be included in the foregoing classes, $10 per mile for each mile in class A, $7 per mile for each mile in class B, and $5 per mile for each mile in class C, and for all roads which shall be constructed subsequent to the passage of this act on each mile in class A the sum of $500, on each mile in class B the sum of $250, and for each mile in class C the sum of $150, and any balance due a State shall be paid under the apportionment provided in section 1 of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has just called my attention to the fact that there is a word omitted at the end of line 7 on page 7, after the word "ensuing." I desire to amend by inserting the word "fiscal."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 7, at the end of the line insert the word "fiscal."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HAMMOND], to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall have power to make all needful rules for the proper administration of the provisions of this act.

Mr. DONOVAN and Mr. GARDNER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is recognized.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. May I have the attention of the chairman of the committee?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Before we start on that, I ask that debate on this section be closed in five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I would like to have five minutes myself.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph be concluded in five minutes.

Mr. GOOD. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section be closed in 10 minutes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] has the floor.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] a question. In reading the RECORD this morning I was unable to come to a conclusion whether or not in his opinion under the provisions of this bill the State of Alabama, for instance, would be empowered to expend the contribution of the National Government for the purpose of employing its own convict labor in the State. The State of Alabama, I am told, employs her convicts, or, at all events, her negro convicts, on her roads. I understand that sometimes she leases her convicts to contractors. Would it be possible under this bill for that State to receive an allowance of money from the United States and then turn around and award that allowance to her own penitentiary department or to some contractor in payment for the work of her own convicts?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the bill, the State will build the roads under such supervision as the Secretary of Agriculture and the State highway departments may agree upon. I presume the State in doing the work may employ its convicts upon the roads if it chooses, and in those States where they do employ them, under section 3 of this bill, where the State is to put up half of the costs, the State would get credit for the convict labor that was employed.

Mr. GARDNER. I want to have this clear for the future. It is an important thing to have the intent of the House clear. As I understand it, if we appropriate $500,000 for the State of Alabama, the State of Alabama can take that $500,000 and pay it over to her penitentiary department, provided it is spent in accordance with section 3 or section 4, or both?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Why, I have stated all there is to it. The State of Alabama does not take the money of the United States, but the Secretary of Agriculture expends the money of the United States.

Mr. GARDNER. Under what section of the bill does the Secretary of Agriculture expend it?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The whole amount of money is to be expended under the joint supervision of the State department of highways and the Secretary of Agriculture, but the warrants drawn by the Secretary of Agriculture are to be paid out by the Treasurer.

Mr. GARDNER. Yes; but I do not see where the Secretary of Agriculture has to consent to the method of spending the money.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That is because, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman only recently began a study of this, and he overlooked that portion of it.

Mr. GARDNER. I shall be glad to see the portion.

Mr. TOWNER. In the latter part of the section, on page 3.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Section 3 provides that the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cooperate with the State officers having power in the construction and maintenance of roads; that such construction and maintenance shall be conducted under such supervision as shall have been previously agreed upon between the Secretary of Agriculture and the State officer or officers of said State. In a previous part of that same section it is provided that they may jointly consider and determine the roads in each State which, under the provisions of this section, may be constructed and maintained, and the material, character, and manner of such construction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] has expired.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER. But the gentleman will observe that section 3 merely says that the supervision shall be previously agreed upon, not the manner of construction and maintenance.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I think he has misread the text of the bill.

Mr. GARDNER. Possibly so.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It says that—

> Between the 1st day of February and the 30th day of June in each fiscal year the Secretary of Agriculture and the officer, or officers, of each State * * * may jointly consider and determine the roads in such States which, under the provisions of this section, may be constructed and maintained during the next fiscal year, and the material, character, and manner of such construction.

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. And now that says it shall be done jointly, and if they do not jointly agree, naturally the United States expends no money on it whatever.

Mr. GARDNER. Then the gentleman would say that the Secretary of Agriculture would be expected under the provisions of the bill to go into the question of what kind of labor should be employed on those roads?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Well, I suppose that would be a matter largely in his discretion. If he desired to agree to it, he would, and if he did not so desire he would not.

Mr. GARDNER. It does not seem to be at all a fair supposition. Any Secretary of Agriculture, reading that bill, would say, "My duty is, first, to see what roads are to be improved; second, to see how they ought to be improved, what the grade shall be, what the surfacing material shall be; and, third, to see under whose supervision the work shall be done, whether under the supervision of persons appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture or of persons appointed by the State highway commission." But it seems to me that in no place in this bill is there any provision inserted which would enable the Secretary of Agriculture to refuse to pay a warrant drawn in favor of the State of Alabama.

I should like to have the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Roads. Will the gentleman show me anything in this bill which would authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to refuse to pay any warrant drawn on him, as provided in line 4, page 7, unless he had specifically forbidden construction of the nature for which the warrant is drawn?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, the clear text of the bill shows that the Secretary of Agriculture could draw a warrant for nothing except for something that had been previously agreed upon between him and the State authorities before construction had commenced.

Mr. GARDNER. But suppose the question had never been raised between him and the State authorities as to whether the State was to contract for convict labor to do all the work?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I suppose that would be decided upon before.

Mr. GARDNER. Is there anything in this bill to prevent the State of Alabama, for example, from taking that Government money and using it to contract with her own convict labor, provided she has enough convicts to do all the road work, State and national? Suppose that the Secretary of Agriculture agrees to the expenditure of the national contribution under the supervision of the State of Alabama. What is to prevent that State from using this contribution to pay herself for her own convict labor, which is now worked on her roads at her own expense? What is to prevent her from leasing her convicts to a road contractor, just as she has leased her convicts to the United States Steel Corporation and to other industrial concerns?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Whatever arrangement is made between the Secretary of Agriculture and the State authorities as to where the road shall be constructed, as to the material out of which it shall be constructed, whether it shall be done by contract or whether it shall be done by the joint employment of labor by the Federal Government and the State authorities, or whether the State authorities will build the road under a supervision that is agreed upon previously between the Secretary of Agriculture and the State officials, is not in the bill and is not intended to be. But that is all to be worked out between the Federal authorities and the States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there any objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman from Missouri will please observe this fact: As this bill is drawn, the moment the Secretary of Agriculture says "You may contract for these roads" the State of Alabama can enter into a contract with Jones, Smith & Co. for the building or surfacing of as many miles of road as may be agreed upon, the State to pay half the bill and the United States to pay half the bill. Thereupon Jones, Smith & Co. could—and very likely would—turn around and hire the State convicts to do the labor. This might be the result: Instead of the Nation's contribution being expended in improving the roads in Alabama it might readily be expended in payment for convict labor which Alabama would employ on her roads in any event. I use Alabama as an illustration without any desire to be irritating to any gentlemen from that State. It is true, however, I believe, that that State leases out her convict labor to private employers. At all events, she was in the habit of doing so two years ago when we were taking evidence before the committee which investigated the United States Steel Corporation.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The gentleman is drawing erroneous conclusions from his reading of this bill. He says the State of Alabama will use its convicts and build no roads and then eat up the Federal appropriation. On what basis does the gentleman build such a structure as that?

Mr. GARDNER. I do not make that statement. I ask the gentleman if there is anything in this bill which prevents it?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER. I can not see it. I have read the gentleman's discussion in the RECORD this morning, and I can not see it. If the gentleman says definitely that the bill will prevent the State of Alabama from utilizing her own convicts——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. This bill does not try to do that. On the contrary, the people who are supporting this bill, as I said yesterday in my colloquy with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], intend that in all the States convicts may be used to work on the roads. It is the expectation that thereby we shall take the convicts out of the shoe shops, harness factories, and clothing establishments, and everything else in competition with the free labor of this country. That is what many expect to do.

Mr. GARDNER. I was not talking about those convicts, and the gentleman knows it. I am talking about the convicts that are already employed on the roads in Alabama, for instance. What is the meaning of this statement of the gentleman in the RECORD?—

> We want to take our convicts out onto the roads and work them, and do not want them to work in the shops under contract in competition with the square labor in the factories and in the trades.

The gentleman knows very well that all throughout the South the convicts are worked on the highroads, and practically there are no other industries where their labor is utilized except when they are contracted out to private employers.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Now, what I want to get at is this: Suppose the people of Alabama say, "These laborers who are now working on the highroads have been a continual source of expense to us. Now we can take this Government money, and, through the medium of a contractor, we can put those same men to work, doing exactly the same work which they have been doing all along. Hitherto all we have gotten out of our convicts is better roads. Now the United States Government is willing to pay for their services." Is that prevented by the bill?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. I am sure that it is not.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will show you how it is. The Secretary of Agriculture will pay out no money except for something he receives in return. Now that the gentleman mentions the State of Alabama as an illustration, I will say that where the State of Alabama uses its convicts on the roads that are being built jointly by the Federal Government and the State she will be given credit for the amount of the reasonable value of this convict labor in the distribution of the apportionment due her.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think no one in the House would accuse me of not giving attention to the details of ordinary bills, and often criticizing the details of those bills. In this case we are somewhat groping in the dark. No one would have been able to draw a bill entirely satisfactory to anyone else. Hence I do not stop to criticize the details of the bill. No two gentlemen would have drawn this bill alike. Probably it will not become a law in the exact form in which it passes the House.

But, after all, the broad question which confronts the House is whether the General Government, which collects all customs dues and which now proposes to collect the income tax, shall pay something toward the construction of rural roads.

Mr. Chairman, we of the cities pay the most of the Federal taxes, or, at least, the income tax. We get no direct benefit, in the way of roads, at least, out of this bill. And yet it is inevitable, under any system of taxation, that many people pay taxes who do not receive direct benefits from those taxes, the most common instance being the payment of school taxes. There is no possibility under any system by which the man who pays the taxes shall receive back directly the expenditure of the money raised by taxation. In my judgment the cities, which, at least in a way, live off the country, can well afford out of their wealth to contribute taxes which shall aid the country in the construction of roads and other improvements. [Applause.] New York, New England, Pennsylvania, and other parts of the great East pay the bulk of the income tax. They will receive comparatively small direct benefits from the expenditures provided by this bill; and yet where would the East be were it not for the South and the West? [Applause.] In the development of our country we can afford to do something out of the Federal Treasury, which has these sources of revenue in the main denied to the States, in the way of internal improvements beyond what many countries could do; and in this effort we are only following behind the other civilized nations of the world in endeavoring to make good roads. As time goes on public improvements will increase in variety and in extent. Every nation can afford as it goes along to pay something toward the public improvement of the country. I do not doubt that we may well use a portion of our taxes in constructing good and permanent roads in the country leading to and from the city. [Applause.]

[Mr. SHACKLEFORD addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, in support of the amendment I offered I wish to say a few words. That part of section 1 of this bill which provides for the apportionment of the $25,000,000 appropriated for each year to the various States in the Union for the encouragement of the building of good roads and for the improvement of our public highways is as follows:

That the Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, may aid the States and the civil subdivisions thereof in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads in an amount not exceeding $25,000,000 in any fiscal year; that the portion thereof which may be expended in any State in any fiscal year shall be determined upon the following basis, to wit: One-half in the proportion which the total population of such State bears to the total population of all the States as shown by the next preceding Federal census, and one-half in the proportion which the total number of miles in rural post roads in use in such States bears to the total number of miles of rural post roads in use in all of the States as shown by the report of the Postmaster General at the close of the second quarter of the last preceding fiscal year.

The money appropriated, however, is paid out only upon certain conditions, which are prescribed in section 4 of the bill. The provision is as follows:

That at the end of each fiscal year the United States shall pay on account of the roads so determined to be in classes A, B, and C, as follows: On each mile in class A the sum of $60, on each mile in class B the sum of $30, and on each mile in class C the sum of $15: Provided, That if in any State the aggregate of said sums would exceed the amount which for that fiscal year has been apportioned to such State under this act to be expended under the provisions of this section, then said sums per mile shall be reduced pro rata so that their aggregate shall not exceed said amount.

Under the apportionment Oklahoma would receive $572,500 annually; $346,250 of this amount would be apportioned on the mileage of the rural routes which are in the State and $226,250 upon the population of the State. The average amount apportioned to the various States is $520,000. It would appear from this that Oklahoma would receive about a fair share to which the State was entitled.

But the apportionment amounts to but little unless the money shall be paid to the State, and here is the difficulty with Oklahoma. Under the provisions of section 4, which I have just quoted, Oklahoma would receive no part of the money apportioned to her under section 1 of the bill, unless she is entitled to receive the same under the provisions of said section 4. All the money Oklahoma could draw would be $60 for each mile of road in class A, $30 for each mile of road in class B, and $15 for each mile of road in class C.

In the report of the Office of Public Roads of the United States Department of Agriculture on mileage and cost of public roads in the United States in 1909, issued as House Document No. 582, Sixty-second Congress, there is given the facts relative to the mileage and cost of good roads in the various States of the Union. This report shows that there is a wide difference in the mileage of improved roads in the various States of the Union. Indiana leads all other States in her mileage of improved roads which would come under classes A and B, as provided in the foregoing amendment. This State is shown by this report to have 24,955 miles of improved roads that would come under classes A and B. Ohio stands next in line with 24,106 miles. New York is next with 12,787 miles. Wisconsin follows New York with 10,167 miles. Kentucky follows next in the amount of her mileage with 10,114 miles. Illinois follows Kentucky with 8,914 miles. California has the next largest mileage with 8,587. There are many States in which the mileage of improved roads that would come under classes A and B is very limited, indeed. Among these may be mentioned the following: Arizona, 273; Colorado, 320; Delaware, 186; Idaho, 510; Kansas, 374; Louisiana, 329; Mississippi, 342; Montana, 95; Nebraska, 248; Nevada, 46; New Mexico, 104; North Dakota, 140; Oklahoma, 361; South Dakota, 286; Wyoming, 416.

Not one of these 12 States has as much as 500 miles of improved roads that would come under classes A and B. The report of the Agricultural Department to which I refer does not show the mileage of public highways which would come under class C.

In conclusion let me say, Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this bill. I sincerely believe in the principle of giving national aid to improve the public highways of this country. I believe in that for several reasons. I believe that the future welfare of this great country depends largely upon the development of the agricultural interests, depends upon the welfare of the men and women on the farms of this country, and I believe that the alleviation of conditions in the rural districts depends largely upon three things: First, improvement in the means of transportation; second, improvement in the means of communication; and, third, improvement in the means and facilities for education. Better transportation, better communication, better education, will bring the farm up to the standard to which it should be brought.

There is this principle that I believe in, however: That in giving national aid for the improvement of our public highways we ought to keep in mind the idea not to pay for what has been done, but to encourage improvements in the future and to encourage better things to be done in the time to come. Therefore I have believed that it would be better to give aid solely for the improvement of roads in the future, and not for what has been done in the past. But even while I criticize this feature, which I believe is to some extent unjust to the West, and is to some extent a discrimination, yet on the whole here is a great bill, which, I believe, if it becomes a law, will bring blessings to the people of this great country and glory and strength to our Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Roads, by unanimous action, presents for the consideration of the Members of the House the bill now before the committee. In doing this the committee believes it is responding to the widespread demand in the country that the National Government should take active part in the construction and maintenance of roads.

At present the activities of the Federal Government, so far as roads are concerned, is limited to testing materials, building experimental roads, and the collection and dissemination of information bearing on various phases of road building.

There were, generally speaking, three plans presented to the committee advocated each by earnest, able, and conscientious citizens:

First. A cooperative system under which the States and the National Government cooperate in the construction and maintenance of roads.

Second. A plan involving a bonus to be given by the National Government to the local road authorities for roads reaching a specified standard, the entire responsibility of the construction and supervision of which would remain with the States.

Third. A national system of highways owned, constructed, and maintained exclusively by and at the expense of the National Government.

Open hearings were held daily by the Road Committee for more than two weeks; the governor of each State was invited to send a representative to make suggestions to the committee in reference to framing a road bill; those Members of the House who had introduced bills on the subject were invited to address the committee, representatives of roads organizations appeared, officials of the Bureau of Public Roads made recommendations, all that action could be had with the fullest light possible. Interesting addresses were made, the various suggestions deliberated upon, with the result that the committee presents a dual plan—an alternative between the cooperative system and the bonus plan, the governor of each State having the right to elect to operate under either system in whole or in part.

The amount of money each State will receive is the same, whether operating entirely under one plan or in part under each. Such amount is based on the ratio that the rural mileage and population, respectively, in a particular State—one-half each—bears to the total rural mileage and total population, respectively, of all the States. The money so authorized to be appropriated is to be expended only on rural post roads in actual use. The total mileage of roads in the United States being 2,199,646 and the total mileage of rural post roads being 1,153,284, it will be seen that the application of the Government money provided in this bill is limited to about 50 per cent of the total road mileage in this country.

In limiting the application of the Government money to rural post roads, the committee had in mind, first, that such a measure would undoubtedly be constitutional, since specific authority is given in the Constitution to establish post roads; and, second, that such roads, namely, the rural free-delivery routes and star routes, in great measure would reach a class of people whose only means of connection with the outside world is these very rural roads. It is on these rural post roads that the farmers of the country reside. There are in the United States, as a whole, 6,351,502 farms used and occupied by the farmers of the country, either as tenants or owners, in whose interest this legislation is proposed. The number of families directly served by the rural free-delivery routes is 4,798,720, of which it is stated that at least 90 per cent, or more than 4,200,000, actually reside on farms. I imagine that there are not more than 5,000,000 families actually residing on the 6,000,000 farms in the country, so that the benefits of this bill will be extended in some measure at least to more than 80 per cent of those families who live on the farms of our country.

All political parties declare in their platforms and all political orators profess on the stump great friendship for the farmer; he is acknowledged to be the basis of our civilization, the bone and sinew of our country, its chief defender in time of war, and its mainstay in time of peace.

As an economic factor, he is the food provider for the Nation. He furnishes from the soil the millions of dollars necessary to carry the balance of trade between this country and the rest of the world. And, withal, he bears his burden uncomplainingly. This bill is a direct effort, if enacted into law, on the part of the Government to aid him.

Those who favor this legislation favor doing something direct, something positive, and something of immediate benefit to the agricultural interests of the country.

The enactment of this legislation into law means an extension of the system of internal improvements from rivers and harbors, public buildings, and canals to take in the means of transportation from the farms to the railway stations.

The farmer can make his crops more cheaply and the consumer of the farmer's products can have them at a lower price. The residents of the country districts will profit but little less than the residents of towns and cities, as the prosperity of each class is mutually interdependent.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary to argue for good roads. There is no argument for the construction of good and better roads that has not been better made by other and more distinguished speakers. Every civilized nation gives prime consideration to the subject, and each solves the problem according to the particular elements of taxation and traffic that enter into the situation.

The main problems with us are how much we can afford to spend as a beginning, or, rather, as a return to this feature of internal improvements, consistent with the other expenditures of the Government, and under what form the assistance shall be given.

The bill provides for an expenditure of $25,000,000 under either of the two plans. This amount, I trust, will be increased from year to year as the system of cooperation is perfected.

The amount of money each State would receive under any bill depends, of course, upon the elements entering into the computation. In the bill before the House the factors are rural post-road mileage and population.

If the amount carried in this bill were distributed among the several States in the ratio of State-road mileage to the total road mileage, or if we take a ratio based on total population alone, or if the ratio be based on rural population alone, or if assessed valuation of property be given consideration, or if in the ratio of State area to total area, or if the distribution be made based upon a combination of all the above elements or any two or any three of them, we would have a set of figures for each differing from each other in various amounts.

The true philosophy of distribution and the proper elements to take into consideration, so far as the National Government is concerned, has not been conclusively determined, but in considering the rural post-road mileage and the entire population and basing the distribution thereon we treat all portions of the country fairly equally, and certainly all will receive some material benefits.

From actual comparison of results from taking different systems the one adopted by the committee strikes a fair average of them all, and I trust will be acceptable to the membership of the House.

Certainly it can be said that there are no glaring inequalities in the plan proposed by the committee. There is no attempt in the bill to differentiate between roads respecting the valuation of property on either side thereof, nor as to the value or kind of traffic over such roads.

These are State matters primarily, and the States differ in their administration of road matters and in their fiscal and other features to such extent that it would be impossible, even if desirable, to prescribe a plan which all could adhere to without variation.

It can be safely assumed that the highway commissions or other State agencies can adjust themselves to local conditions and to the satisfaction of the Department of Agriculture.

In framing the bill, as upon almost every great public question, there were found two distinct lines of thought and policy in advocating governmental participation in the construction and maintenance of good roads. A great many very earnest and very intelligent and public-spirited citizens urge the Government to build, supervise, and maintain its own system, whether large or small, of national highways. One association of such citizens has submitted a plan embracing 30,000 miles, another a plan covering 50,000 miles, to be the main arteries of road commerce, in the belief and expectation that the States and local authorities, each or both, would build lateral branches, thus making a network of roads reaching every important section of the country.

To build such national highways would cost the Government, it is estimated, from $5,000 to $22,000 per mile, according to local conditions. The average cost would be about $15,000 per mile. On this basis a 50,000-mile system would cost, complete, about $750,000,000, almost as much as the present total outstanding indebtedness of the United States, and yet when completed less than 2½ per cent of the total road mileage of the country would thus be constructed.

Such a system would involve an annual expenditure for maintenance of about $25,000,000.

Our constitutional right to construct such a system is undoubted. This question gave us no concern. We were concerned only with the question as to how far we should recommend that Congress should go in the exercise of such great powers.

We did not permit our zeal for good roads to outweigh our caution, and we could not see our way clear to propose such an enormous expenditure on the part of the National Government from which we probably could never escape when only 2½ per cent of the roads would be constructed, and even these failing in large measure to reach the people—the farmers of the country—whom this bill is intended primarily to benefit.

The cooperative system presented as an alternative by the committee preserves to the several States the jurisdiction and sovereignty over the roads within their borders, and yet the interest of the National Government in those roads as agencies for the discharge to the people of a national function in the delivery of mails, from the standpoint of the general welfare, has not been disregarded.

Will it not also follow that as we build and maintain and extend this system or network of rural post roads better methods of construction and management will result; that through the States themselves or the local communities or through private donations and subscriptions the whole system of rural post roads will be connected, the roads of adjoining States linked together, and by degrees, as means and capital are available, a great road system will be built up by the people themselves, and thus we find ourselves accomplishing the dream of road expansionists, in having roads that "begin somewhere and end somewhere"?

In the bill we present in its alternative features we are, so to speak, feeling our way.

If it is found that its plans are defective or inadequate or that what we contemplate under its provisions are not realized after a fair trial, it will be easy to adjust the basis of Federal participation in the light of experience.

I do not speak as one versed technically on this subject, which is a very difficult as well as a very large one. Every proposed solution has in it good features, but in this initial and experimental stage of road building we feel that the bill presented to the House promises a maximum of good results with a mimimum of complications.

[Mr. LANGLEY addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I favor this bill. The building of roads by the Government is not a new proposition. As early as 1806 Congress appropriated money for the construction of the Cumberland Road, and the arguments urged in its favor were very similar to the arguments presented in favor of the present bill. The appropriations for that road continued for over 30 years. Later on, when railroads were being constructed in the various States of the Union, it was deemed that thereafter they would be the means of bringing the products of the farm, the factory, and the workshop to the urban centers and the seaboard of the Nation. Therefore Congress made no further appropriations for road construction. But, in my judgment, the time has come when the Government can well afford to take up that policy once more. I do not look upon the expenditure of money for this purpose as being in the nature of a "pork barrel." The Government has been very liberal toward railroad corporations in developing the great western areas of the United States. Those railroads would probably not have been built until a much later period if the Government had not lent its valuable assistance. There can be no question as to the great factor the Government land-grant railroads have been in the upbuilding of the West. The roads provided for in this bill will enable the rural letter carriers to bring the mail to the residents of the rural districts with much greater facility than they do at present. They will prove of inestimable value as military highways if the occasion for such use should ever arise. These roads will enable the farmer to bring his crops of garden truck to the urban centers with greater facility. In that way it will probably have a very important bearing upon the question of the high cost of living. I hope that the time will come when the Government will also undertake to construct canals in the various sections of the country so as to afford additional facilities for the farmers of the United States to market their crops without too much reliance upon the railroads.

In Europe there is scarcely a stream of any consequence that is not paralleled by a canal. The result is that in European countries the questions of exorbitant rates and fares for railroad transportation are seldom heard. The good roads and the canals afford the needed competition to keep down excessive railroad rates. In our own country no State has done more for good roads and for canals than the Empire State of New York. That State has secured a direct benefit for its shippers by reason of its great expenditures for these public utilities. The rates of fares and freights in New York are probably lower, and have always been lower, than in any other State in the Union. It may be asserted that this is due largely to the great number of passengers and the volume of freight carried by the railroads. But I feel quite confident that if the Erie Canal and the excellent roads that are found throughout the entire State of New York were nonexistent the railroad rates would be materially higher there than they are to-day. For these reasons I believe that this bill ought to be enacted into law. My own State of California is at present expending millions of dollars for the improvement of its roads. It has always been ready to do its share toward improving conditions of transportation for its inhabitants. Many other States have also expended large sums for good roads. What with the effort on the part of the States themselves and the aid given by the Government under this bill the good roads throughout this country will multiply enormously and will conduce to the comfort, the enjoyment, and the happiness of the American people.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, I said a few words in favor of this bill while it was under general debate. And now, being inspired to do so by the valuable suggestions of a distinguished Oregonian who sits by my side, and who served as a Member of this House 30 years ago, and for many years thereafter, Hon. Binger Hermann, I desire to add just a word of historical data which seems appropriate.

Oregon and Missouri are historically linked together upon the subject of good roads. It was from Missouri, then the western frontier of the Nation, that a band of heroic men and women set out in 1843 for Oregon. It was due to that courageous band of emigrants that the first wagon crossed the continent to the Pacific Ocean.

It was the Applegates, the Waldos, the Nesmiths, and the Burnetts of Missouri, with the martyred Dr. Marcus Whitman, who blazed the way and laid out the pioneer wagon trail, thus becoming the actual pathfinders in advance of Fremont. It was due to the inspiring eloquence of Senator Benton, of Missouri, in picturing the possibilities of the Pacific Northwest, that these hardy Missourians were moved to go to Oregon 71 years ago. Their going saved the Oregon country to the Nation, as against the rival claims of Great Britain.

The measure now before us was written and is championed by another distinguished Missourian [Judge SHACKLEFORD]. It is but the beginning of a great national undertaking, which will make travel and transportation by wagon a comfort and a delight. From the Pacific coast I extend a hand, as would all our people if they could, to the author of this great measure.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Chairman, we are now considering this great measure, known as the good-roads measure, under the five-minute rule. It is not my intention to attempt any speech upon this occasion, as the measure is so manifestly beneficial to all our citizens and to the entire country that I do not consider that the measure needs any speech in its defense or in its behalf. I am very heartily and earnestly in favor of this bill. I simply rise to make a few observations which this measure suggests, showing its far-reaching, beneficial effect.

The passage of this bill will have a far-reaching influence in many directions, and it is this feature that I shall briefly allude to rather than attempt any discussion in defense of the bill.

GOOD ROADS AND FLOOD PROTECTION RATHER THAN WARSHIPS.

Our actions to-day in passing this measure, as I feel confident we shall by an immense majority pass it, speaks in thunder tones of that growing sentiment for peace—that peace that is soon to be—for when we, as Members of Congress of the United States, prefer to vote the people's money for building good roads for the benefit of the humblest of our citizens and all our citizens, and also for the fortification of our rivers and streams to prevent floods and overflows and to protect the homes of all the people, and particularly the homes of the humblest of our people who most frequently reside in the danger portions along our streams and rivers, rather than vote to appropriate this money for the building of great battleships that float in idleness the seas at great expense to challenge quarrels; I repeat our action, thus expressed, indicates the oncoming of a growing demand, not only for peace, but for a wiser expenditure of the people's money.

GOOD RESULTS FOLLOWING GOOD ROADS.

In the few moments which I have at my disposal I can only note a few of the good results that will follow from this bill. One fine effect that must be apparent to all is the growing sentiment of brotherhood among our citizens, or sisterhood among the States, so to speak. This spirit is manifest when

States that possibly need help for good roads least and will, in addition, pay most of the appropriation, are willing to vote this help to States that need it most and will pay least for the benefits that flow therefrom.

Another benefit to all the people, regardless of citizenship in any State, will be the good effect in inducing our young people to stay on the farm, thus helping solve the ever-important question of supply and demand and high prices of food supplies, for when we have good roads, such as I feel that in a few generations we will have, few, I take it, but what would prefer the freedom and enjoyment of residing outside of the cities rather than in them, and the attraction to stay on the farm will be very materially increased.

Another great benefit that will come from this bill, and one that appeals to me very strongly indeed, is this: It presents better facilities and better opportunities to the people in the country for school-going and church-going privileges, and this means, of course, a stronger, better citizenship and a stronger, better, greater United States of America. [Applause.]

We are making better roads for the little feet that travel the dirt roads to the country schoolhouse; we are making better roads for people who attend their places of worship in the country; and the country schoolhouse and the country church, in my estimation, should always be maintained and encouraged. By this means we are giving to all the people the greatest boon which Heaven can vouchsafe to man—the opportunity for that culture of mind which should lift mankind nearer his Maker.

Mr. Chairman, if it shall turn out in the years that lie before us that our efforts in behalf of good roads shall have this effect in the life and development of our people, then we can look back and see that we have not only been building a highway of trade and commerce but a highway of righteousness through the lives and hearts of all our people as well. I trust this may be so, and I therefore most cheerfully give my support to this bill. [Applause.]

[Mr. THOMSON of Illinois addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. TEMPLE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. It is evidently manifest that the Congress of the United States will hereafter pave the roads of the country with other than good intentions, and I am in hearty accord with the main provisions of the bill. It is a long stride in the right direction.

President McKinley said, "We can not continue selling our products to the outside world and never purchase the wares of other countries in return." By this act of legislation we are surely returning to the people at least some of the taxes wrung from honest toil. The people in a great measure are to come into possession of their own. The advantages to be derived are not local or sectional—they are national. We do not segregate the interests of townfolk from those of the people living in rural districts; on the contrary, we now are solidifying and harmonizing the interests of all. This bill offers facilities for a better and more rapid distribution of the mail, and affords a speedier and better means to the farmer for transporting the products of his toil to the consumer. It is an admirable working out of the old adage, "You tickle me, and I'll tickle you."

The bill may possibly be crude in some of its formalities, but of these the future Members of Congress will be cognizant, and in nowise unmindful of their solemn obligations. This is one of the few measures introduced here that is completely shorn of all partisan objection or party fealty. It is an awakening to better promise of bringing all the people into stronger commercial relations, and, better still, it will insure fraternal greetings such as have never before been exercised by citizens of both town and country.

Then let us by all means try out the provisions of this bill from a broad and liberal viewpoint, so that bad roads will in the future no longer burden us as we advance along the lines of new and progressive ideas.

[Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 3 for the purpose of introducing a committee amendment which was overlooked.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to return to section 3 for the purpose of offering a committee amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I send to the desk a committee amendment which was inadvertently overlooked in the consideration of the bill on yesterday.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 24, after the semicolon, strike out the following language:

"That such construction and maintenance shall be conducted under such supervision as shall have been previously agreed upon by the Secretary of Agriculture and said officer or officers of said State."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the several States shall afford such inspection and supervision of said construction and maintenance as shall be required by the Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment was voted by the committee and was intended to be offered yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate on the bill be concluded in 10 minutes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Missouri must mean the section and not the bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will ask, Mr. Chairman, unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, there is a very natural and widespread desire on the part of the American people for some action by the Federal Government toward the improvement of rural highways, and that desire is joined in as much by the people of the cities as by people in the rural sections. This country is one whole—it is one Nation in its interests, in its sentiment, and in its destiny. There is no divison of sentiment on the subject of good roads between those who live in the city districts and those who live in the country. [Applause.] The cities realize that the work and improvement of the roads directly benefits the commerce of the Nation, raises the standard of American citizenship, makes a higher plane of living all over the land, and improves the means of communication and transportation into the country, making it one indissoluble Nation. There is no chain so powerful as transportation to combine all sections of the country together. In this great matter of good roads any attempt to make an issue as to the different interests of the city and the country must necessarily fail before the judges of an impartial Nation.

When we come to appropriate $25,000,000 of the people's money it is the money of the people of the cities as well as the money of the people of the country. We are charged with the duty of finding a way to expend that money to accomplish the result which the people want, and that duty we can not shirk or abdicate. We can not say that our intentions were good; that we had good sentiment behind us in advocating a certain law that we are so in favor of that we do not care about the details of it. That is no answer to the responsibility which the Members of this House are put under. The Member is here not to express a sentiment, but to legislate. There is some place which is said to be paved with good intentions, but I never saw a road paved with good intentions that was satisfactory to the people. No road in this country paved solely with good intentions will be satisfactory to the people if it costs $25,000,000 of the people's money.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. If the country roads were paved with good intentions, the gentleman would be willing to have that done by the Federal Government, but if it is to cost money he does not want it done?

Mr. BORLAND. I am in favor of having the roads paved by Government money if it can be properly done.

Mr. MANN. I am glad to know it, for I did not suppose that was the case.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman has not heard what I have said.

Mr. MANN. I have been watching the gentleman closely for several days, and I did not think he was in favor of it.

Mr. BORLAND. I think that a great many of these country roads have been paved with good intentions, and the time is coming when the people's money, which is expended therefor, must be expended on the roads. In this House that is true, and we face the responsibility for the expenditure of this money.

Now, section 5 is the one saving clause of the bill. It says that the Secretary of Agriculture shall have the power to make all needful rules for the proper administration of the provisions of this act. He will make them. In the absence of any workable rule in the bill the Secretary of Agriculture will make them. In the absence of a workable rule in the $500,000 appropriation we made at the last session the Secretary of Agriculture made the rules. In other words, the executive will legislate and we will abdicate, as we have frequently in the past.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for half a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to address the committee for half a minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have made the best speech that has been made on this bill, because I have not said a word.

Mr. MANN. Stick to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMAS. I would say that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] could profit by my example. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the people of this country may want a speech from me and may want to read it, therefore I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new section.

The Clerk read as follows:

That in computing the amount each State has contributed to the improvement of its rural post roads no credit shall be given any such State for the employment of convict labor on such roads, unless the amount charged by such State for each convict so employed shall be placed to the credit of each convict, less a reasonable amount charged such convict for subsistence when so employed.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I believe public sentiment in this country is opposed to convict labor.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I believe that in writing this law upon as great a subject as we are now legislating upon Congress ought to put its stamp of disapproval upon convict labor, unless the convict is given credit for his labor that may be used for the support of his family. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] referred in a rather uncomplimentary way to an experiment that is being attempted to-day in the State of Iowa with regard to caring for convicts, and I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama that the great State he represents in the House could, with credit to itself and honor and glory to this country, follow in the footsteps of Iowa in the care of its convicts. [Applause.] We are doing simply this: We are permitting the convicts to work that they may become useful citizens when they leave the reformatory or the State's prison. When they work they are given credit for the labor they perform; they are paid a reasonable wage and are charged a reasonable amount for subsistence, and the money they thus earn goes to the support of the family of that convict, which is too often left in destitute circumstances, and a part of it is saved to give the convict when he leaves the prison a free man, so that he will not be turned out destitute.

The men who are foremost in the study of this question say that it is the greatest step yet taken by any Commonwealth of the country in the care of its unfortunates who are confined in prison.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I can not yield.

The greatest hardship that arises in a community because it has imprisoned some one is found in the misfortune that falls upon the family of the convict. We punish the convict, the criminal, and while doing so we are also adding greater penalties and punishment to the family of that unfortunate person. This provision, if adopted, will simply provide this: If convict labor is employed upon our public highways, and States are to reach their hands into the Federal Treasury because of that employment, then the unfortunates shall be given the credit for their employment. What objection can there possibly be to this plan? Why does the great State of Alabama want to use this entire amount that would be allotted to that State and then employ convicts to do the work and not pay them a penny for their labor? That State would then receive about $580,000 to expend upon its roads, but by employing convicts it would not be obliged to expend any of it. It is not fair. It is not fair to honest labor; it is not just to the convicts; and it will be a disgrace upon a great body such as this to so legislate in the face of the statement of the gentleman from Missouri that that is one of the objects of the measure. He says that in the State of Colorado they employ their convicts on the public highways without guards. They simply turn them out in the morning, and they work until night and then go back into the penitentiary. That kind of an argument is about in keeping with some of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that this amendment ought to be adopted. It is in line with the best thought in the country in respect to the care of convicts, and it will do injury to absolutely no State.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GOOD) there were—ayes 44, noes 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That necessary bridges and culverts shall be deemed to be a part of the respective roads constructed, improved, or maintained under the provisions of this act.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman offers his amendment, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto conclude in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto conclude in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, the Chair ought to know by this time that a motion of that kind is not in order before there has been debate.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman asked unanimous consent.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that it be made 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington object?

Mr. BRYAN. I object.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, then I ask unanimous consent that it be concluded in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I offer is in the nature of a new section, to come in after line 3, on page 6, and the conclusion of section 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 3, after the word "act," as a new section, insert the following:

"That one-half the amount of the first appropriation under this act shall be distributed among the States which have made appropriations for improved highways in proportion that the mileage of improved highways in each State bears to the improved mileage in all the States."

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered following along the line of the remarks I made yesterday, wherein I stated it appears to me that certain credit ought to be given States for work that has been done previous to the adoption of this bill. There are many States in the Union, and the one I have the honor in part to represent is one, where they have for years been making appropriations for improved highways. It seems to me a hardship that no credit should be given the States for the work that has been done previous to the adoption of this bill. I have tried very hard to find in this bill any place where any credit is to go to the States for any previous construction. I find we can secure from $15 to $60 per mile for maintenance of roads previously constructed, but that we have no credit whatever for the work of construction already done. The committee can not show us where any credit does exist for any previous construction, and it is quite evident that it is not so intended. I hope the bill will be so construed, but I fear it will not be.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I ask that this be designated as part of the purposes for which the first appropriation shall be made.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the chairman of the committee desires to make a motion to close debate, and I want to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman if he does not interpret the provisions of this bill to mean that as long as there are any roads in Massachusetts to improve Massachusetts will get the benefit under the classification for the roads already constructed.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not so construe it, and the committee does not seem to explain it in that way—that any road that has previously been constructed as an improved highway receives any credit under this bill. It does not, other than the fifteen to sixty dollars per mile for maintenance of the road. I have always been an advocate of good roads and have been especially interested in those reaching outlying rural communities, of which there are many in my district. No class of our people can use good roads to better advantage than those in our smallest rural communities. As it has been the policy in Massachusetts to benefit such sections, I hope when this bill becomes law those in charge of carrying out its provisions will find a way to construe the act so that our State may share in its benefits in proportion to the interest its citizens have had in the cause of good roads. While there are features of the bill I would change, if possible, and while I do not consider that the State I in part represent is treated fairly, I shall vote for the bill on the theory that part of a loaf is better than none.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto conclude in seven minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all debate on the section and amendments thereto conclude in seven minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment pending is to insert a new section, and I suppose the gentleman desires to close debate on section 6 and on this new section?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Yes; let that be included.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that debate on section 6 and the pending amendment, and all amendments to section 6 and to the pending amendment, conclude in seven minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I have received a letter from the governor of the State of Washington in respect to this legislation, and I would like to have that letter read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF WASHINGTON,
OFFICE OF GOVERNOR,
Olympia, February 5, 1914.

Hon. J. W. BRYAN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BRYAN: I received your letter of December 30, in relation to the road bills now pending before Congress. I have withheld answering the letter until I could become a little better informed regarding the bills before you and also so that I might have an opportunity of talking the matter over with our State highway commissioner.

In Washington we are doing more systematic road work than ever before. The State, from its public highway fund, is undertaking to do a large part of the work on main highways connecting the different counties of the State together. With the permanent highway fund, expended by the county commissioners of the several counties, commissioners are doing work on main highways through the counties and also upon the more important roads within the counties. The road and bridge and other funds are used for extending and repairing the country roads.

I believe that our State would receive more real benefit from a Federal appropriation if it were based upon a fixed amount per mile, to be turned over to the highway department of the State, and to be expended in places where the State expends an equal amount. Personally I would have no objections to the provision calling for the State expending twice the amount that would be appropriated by the Federal Government. Some such plan as this followed would be of material assistance to the State highway department in carrying out the general plan for the construction of main highways throughout the State. It would also avoid the possibility of parallel roads being constructed—one by the Federal Government and one by the State.

This is just made to you as a suggestion. The bill that comes most nearly fitting such a condition as this would, in my opinion, be the bill that would be most acceptable to the State of Washington.

Yours, very truly,

ERNEST LISTER, Governor.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I think the criticism made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] is not well founded. This is a proposition and a question that we considered early in the framing of this bill. If you will read the bill carefully, you will find that under the third section the States, if they desire to adopt that method, will get the same amount of money whether they have any improved roads or not. It makes no difference whether they have improved or unimproved roads under section 3. And so long as they have any roads in their State which they desire to improve, and are willing to put up their money to meet it, they will get the benefit under the provisions of this bill. Under the plan provided in section 4 we were careful to make an equitable allowance and provision for taking care of the situation called to our attention by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY]. Where a State has improved its own roads and made them of macadam they get $60 a mile; when they have improved them in another way they get $30 a mile; and when they have improved them in another way they get $15 a mile; and in that way every State can secure equitable and fair treatment of the situation as it is.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. With pleasure.

Mr. MANN. Under this provision are they not authorized to expend this money for the extension of any of these roads?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes; or the improvement of them.

Mr. MANN. I mean, taking a macadam road that is built, they get $60 a mile. Now, they are authorized to extend that road, and the extension, I suppose, comes under this provision?

Mr. PROUTY. Surely. I think the bill, as it is drawn carefully, takes care of the general criticism the gentleman raises.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if that $60 on the macadam road can be used for maintenance?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes.

Mr. PARKER. Do you consider that $60 a mile for the maintenance of macadam roads that cost $8,000 or $10,000 a mile is an equitable division with $15 a mile for the maintenance of a dirt road when it has been demonstrated time and time again that it costs from $1,000 to $3,000 a mile to repair a macadam road?

Mr. PROUTY. The question that the gentleman asks me would lead me to a question the discussion of which would not be parliamentary at this time.

Mr. PARKER. The gentleman made a statement that he thought that was an equitable division.

Mr. PROUTY. I will say that the distribution that is made in the bill is as nearly equitable as you can get it. I do not say that always and under all circumstances it is equitable, but it is a pretty fair division.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I will.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Is it not a fact that the purpose of the provisions of this bill is to promote the proper maintenance of roads?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Now, is it not a fact that it does not cost $1,500 to $3,000 per mile to maintain a macadam road if the proper work is done on that road annually as it should be? In my county we have something like 125 miles of macadam road, and we aim to put the proper amount of work on those roads each year. And I say to the membership of this committee that when the proper amount of work is put upon those macadam roads each year it does not cost to exceed $150 per mile.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute in order that I may ask the gentleman from Iowa one more question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is this: He said that this matter which was proposed in my amendment has been carefully considered, namely, for credit for money already spent by a State, and that it is included in the bill in some way.

Mr. PROUTY. I did not say that. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. TREADWAY. My proposition is this: Massachusetts has spent $14,000,000 for improvement of highways, and will we under the bill get any credit for that sum, in proportion, as you are distributing this $25,000,000?

Mr. PROUTY. I think you will get the same credit that any other State will get for postal roads.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 7. That this act shall be in force from and after July 1, 1914.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following. I want to say in offering this that inasmuch as I offered the substitute section by section I am going to ask unanimous consent that it be not read. I offered a substitute section to each section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] offers a substitute to the bill, and, for reasons stated by him, he asks unanimous consent that it be not read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The substitute is as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend an amount not exceeding $25,000,000 in any one year in cooperating with the States of the Union in improving, constructing, and maintaining rural highways available for use by the United States for post roads, military roads, and interstate-traffic roads. Such funds shall be apportioned among the several States as follows: One-half in the proportion that the mileage of the post roads within the State bears to the total mileage of post roads in the United States, exclusive of star routes, and one-half in the proportion that the commodities produced within the State bears to the total production of commodities in the United States.

SEC. 2. For the purpose of improvement, construction, and maintenance, the rural roads of the country shall be classified into three classes, on the basis of the amount of traffic which the roads carry or are capable of carrying. Class A shall embrace interstate highways connected with a general system of highways throughout the United States; class B shall embrace State highways, main branches, and feeders for the interstate highways, which shall extend into every county within the State; class C shall embrace county highways and local post roads connected with a market town and with a main interstate or State highway.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of Agriculture shall, with the assistance of the Office of Public Roads of the Department of Agriculture, establish standard specifications as to grades, drainage, bridges, culverts, roadbeds, and the surfacing of the various classes of roads, having in view the topography of the country, the character of the soil, the climate, the kind and accessibility of road material. The Office of Public Roads of the Department of Agriculture shall continue the investigation and classification of scientific information upon the proper location, grading, drainage, construction, and maintenance of rural roads, and shall at all times furnish to State highway departments or highway engineers expert advice and assistance on such subjects.

SEC. 4. The governor of each State may make, under his hand and the seal of the State and file with the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, a statement setting forth: First, that the State has a highway department or a highway engineer with full legal powers to improve, construct, or maintain rural highways; second, the road or roads within the State to be improved, constructed, or maintained under each of the classes hereinbefore specified; third, the amount of funds available within the control of the highway department or highway engineer of the State for such improvement, construction, and maintenance, which shall not be less than double the allotment to which the State is entitled from the funds of the United States under the terms of this act; fourth, the amount and character of the work which the State will do within the next fiscal year, and the use which is desired to be made of the funds allotted to the State by the Secretary of Agriculture under the authority of this act. Such statement may be filed at any time after the approval of this act, and an annual statement showing necessary changes for the ensuing fiscal year shall be filed on or before the 20th day of January of each year. All subsequent statements after the first statement filed by the governor shall show in detail the amount of the improvement, construction, and maintenance of roads accomplished by the State in the prior fiscal year, together with the specific use which has been made of the allotment from the funds of the United States under the terms of this act. The Secretary of Agriculture shall examine said statement and determine: First, whether the State has a highway department or highway engineer clothed with full legal powers over the improvement, construction, and maintenance of rural roads; second, whether the work to be done by the State is feasible and practical within the estimate, and of a proper engineering character to bring the roads within the class or classes designated; third, whether the State under its constitution and laws can cooperate with the United States in the improvement, construction, and maintenance of the roads; fourth, whether a proper fund is provided for the maintenance of the system of roads within the State as constructed or proposed to be constructed. If the Secretary of Agriculture be satisfied on these points, he shall adopt the location and classification of the roads as specified by the governor of the State and shall allot to the State its proportion of the road fund created by this act for the fiscal year next ensuing. If the statement as filed by the governor shows a larger amount of improvement, construction, and maintenance of roads than the funds available, including the allotment from the funds of the United States, will be sufficient to accomplish, the Secretary of Agriculture shall withhold the funds until the estimate is reduced. If in any subsequent year after the allotment to a State of funds from the United States the statement of the governor fails to show improvement, construction, or maintenance of roads reasonably approximate to the estimate made, subject to the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture, he shall withhold the allotment of money under the terms of this act until the proportion of road work in the State is brought up approximately to the estimate submitted, having in view climatic conditions, increased cost of material, or any unforeseen events or factors.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to make rules and regulations for the purpose of carrying into effect this act, which rules shall include reasonable provisions for the proper scientific maintenance of the roads of the various classes as the same may be constructed. He shall not approve any estimate for the improvement or construction of roads without adequate provision for the maintenance of the roads so improved or constructed in the class to which they belong. The governor of the State may, with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, in any annual statement change the classification of particular roads.

SEC. 6. All acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUBEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11686, entitled "A bill to provide that the United States shall, in certain cases, aid the States and the civil subdivisions thereof in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads," and had instructed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has already been ordered under the rules. Is a separate vote demanded on any particular amendment? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LANGLEY. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill, and on that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 284, nays 42, answered "present" 5, not voting 101, as follows:

Mr. HOBSON with Mr. FAIRCHILD.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I voted "yea." I have a general pair with my colleague Mr. SCULLY, who is opposed to the bill, and I wish to withdraw my vote and be recorded as "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. BROWNING, and he answered "Present."

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. STANLEY, vote?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. ALLEN. I voted "nay," Mr. Speaker. I am paired with the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. STANLEY, and I wish to withdraw my vote and vote "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. ALLEN, and he answered "Present."

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from Texas, Mr. SLAYDEN, vote?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. MOORE. I have a pair with Mr. SLAYDEN, and I voted "yea." Mr. SLAYDEN is opposed to the bill. Therefore I wish to withdraw my vote and vote "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. MOORE, and he answered "Present."

Mr. BOWDLE. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. HELM, vote?

The SPEAKER. He is not recorded.

Mr. BOWDLE. I wish to withdraw my vote, as I had a pair with him. I voted "nay." I desire to answer "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. BOWDLE, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. SAUNDERS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House have five legislative days in which to print remarks on this bill.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman limit his request to those who spoke upon the bill?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I had to deny time to so many Members who wished to discuss this subject that I should like to include all Members of the House. Some who wanted to be heard on this bill are out in Colorado and some are away up in Michigan.

Mr. MANN. They can make the request when they return. It is an exceedingly bad practice to grant general leave on such bills as this.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object to the request in its present form.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Then I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have spoken on this bill have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. For five days?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. No; that those who have spoken have leave to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that those who have spoken on the roads bill have leave to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD on that subject. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent that I may be recorded in favor of this bill. I had some work down at one of the departments, and rushed up here as quickly as I could. I hope the House will give me unanimous consent to be recorded in favor of the bill.

Mr. MANN. That is not possible under the rules of the House. The Chair can not even submit such a request.

Mr. RAKER. It has been done. I tried to get up here as soon as I could.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman had started before 12 o'clock, he would have been here before the vote was taken.

Mr. RAKER. I was here, and stayed here until I understood the matter was not to be voted upon until later. We had a lot of men from California before the Attorney General, and we went down to the meeting.

Mr. MANN. This has no business to go into the RECORD.

Mr. RAKER. Will the Chair submit my request?

The SPEAKER. That would be an extremely hazardous practice to enter upon.

NAVAL MILITIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 8667) to promote the efficiency of the Naval Militia, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the Senate amendments. They are purely verbal and do not change at all the essence of the bill as it passed the House, but simply correct the verbiage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to agree to the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the good-roads bill.

Mr. FARR. I make the same request.

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut. I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR], and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks on the good-roads bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW A REPORT.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the report of the Committee on Military Affairs upon House bill 8479, for the purpose of amending it.

Mr. MANN. May we have a statement of what the bill is?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 8479) to repeal section 3 of article 110 of section 1342 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, enacted July 27, 1892.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] asks unanimous consent to withdraw the report of the Committee on Military Affairs on this bill and to file another report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DALLAS CORN EXPOSITION.

The SPEAKER appointed as the committee to attend the Dallas (Tex.) Corn Exposition, Mr. SLAYDEN, Mr. SUMNERS, Mr. GARRETT of Texas, Mr. HENRY, Mr. BEALL of Texas, Mr. WINGO, Mr. TAGGART, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. MCKENZIE, Mr. SLOAN, and Mr. BRYAN.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12579) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915; and, pending that, I ask gentlemen on the other side if we can agree on the time for general debate. I do not see the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], the ranking Republican member of the committee, in the Hall at this moment.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] is the ranking Republican member of the committee present.

Mr. NORTON. This side desires at least four hours for general debate.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Two hours on a side?

Mr. NORTON. No; we desire four hours on this side.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I hoped that we could get along with four hours, two hours on this side and two hours on that, and I hope the gentleman will agree to that.

Mr. MANN. We absolutely need four hours on this side, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman then agree to five hours, if we take two hours on this side and give to gentlemen on that side three hours?

Mr. MANN. We will agree to four hours.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We will concede you one hour of our time.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman had better make it six hours, and give us four hours and take two for his side. Gentlemen who have speeches to make might as well have the opportunity at one time as another.

Mr. CARTER. I think there are several Members on this side who have speeches that they want to get out of their systems. I would not care to agree to take less time on this side than is given to the other side. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] will permit, I think we had better agree to four hours on a side.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I am sure we will not need all of that time on our side, and we will give some of it to that side.

Mr. MANN. Well, give it to us now.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think it would be hardly the fair thing to do, not knowing what direction the debate may take, to give you double the time we have.

Mr. MANN. We do not ask that. Suppose you give us four hours and you take four hours. You are not required to use it; and if we can get along without it, we will not use it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is a long while for general debate; but I would rather agree to it than leave the matter open.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman had better agree to it. That is a short general debate.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate be confined to eight hours, four hours to be controlled by myself and four hours by the ranking Republican member of the committee.

Mr. MANN. By the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the general debate on this bill be limited to eight hours, four hours to be controlled by himself and four hours by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12579) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, this bill has been carefully prepared by the Committee on Indian Affairs; in fact, we spent the holidays through a subcommittee in the preparation of the bill. We gave extensive hearings on the bill, and they comprise 700 pages that cover every feature of the bill.

The estimates on which the bill is based are found on pages 333 to 353, inclusive, of the Book of Estimates, and aggregate the sum of $11,784,865.60. The amount carried in this bill is $9,619,737.82, being $2,165,127.24 less than the estimates submitted by the department.

The bill carries gratuity appropriations payable from the Federal Treasury, aggregating $6,874,737.82; reimbursable from the Indian fund, $932,740; in Treasury items, $850,560; and of Indian trust funds in the Treasury to the credit of the Indians we appropriate $962,000.

The amount carried in the last Indian appropriation bill for the present fiscal year for all the above stated purposes aggregated $10,049,394.74. The amount recommended by the committee herein is $9,619,737.82, which is $429,656.92 less than the amount carried in the last Indian appropriation bill, and is also $2,165,127.24 less than the department's estimate for the next fiscal year.

In this report by the committee on this bill we have stated at length the changes that we have made from the last Indian appropriation bill. We have carefully taken from the bill all the legislation that was put upon the bill in the shape of private claims of persons who had claims against the Indians. Several of these were recommended by the department. The committee is intending to have a general claims bill. We expect that all the private bills on our calendar will be taken up in a proper way, each one will be heard separately, and then laid aside, if the committee so determines, with a favorable report. Then we will prepare an omnibus bill and present it to the House and include all of these private bills, including those recommended by the department. Hence no man will have a claim on this bill. We consider private bills in a general appropriation bill very bad legislation. Your committee therefore refused to adopt any of these claims. We have reduced many items estimated by the department where the estimates materially increase the number of students and permanent improvements on nonreservation schools. The system has been growing for some time of building up nonreservation schools—that is, schools outside of the reservation, boarding and industrial and other schools—for the reason that we believe that better work can be done by making the expenditures of the Government only in boarding schools on the reservation. We have adopted the policy, and think it is the proper policy, of taking the schools to the Indians and educating them near home instead of carrying them away a hundred miles from their homes to educate them. This policy has been the policy of the Government for some time, but we find in every annual appropriation bill that they continue to estimate for more buildings for nonreservation schools, and they continue to estimate for 50 or 100 more pupils, which would carry a larger appropriation. In every case we have cut down the amount.

During the last extra session a special committee was appointed under a resolution of the House and the Senate whereby three Members of the House and three Members of the Senate were organized into a committee, with Senator ROBINSON, of Arkansas, as chairman, charged with the duty of ascertaining whether or not we should have a general hospital for tuberculosis and trachoma patients found among the Indians on various reservations. We went to the Pacific coast, New Mexico, and made a thorough investigation of this question. We ascertained that it would be impossible to get the Indians, especially in the Northwest, to go so far away from home to be treated in hospitals.

We ascertained that they would have to be forced to go, and that the injury to the patients would be much greater than the benefit derived from the climate in the southern part of the United States.

We therefore reported that in our judgment we should build hospitals on the reservations, and you will find that this bill carries a sufficient amount for that purpose. We changed the language of the bill. They estimated for a specific sum, and we have made a lump-sum appropriation for the purpose of enlarging the hospitals. In one instance we have asked that the fort at Spokane, an abandoned fort in Washington, shall be used for the purpose of creating a building there, or enlarging the building, for a hospital for the Indians of the Northwest. We find quite a number of Indians on the reservation, and this fort has some very valuable land attached to it, and has 20 or 30 good buildings that can be used for that purpose; and we regard it as bad legislation to let the property be sold and not used for hospital purposes.

We have investigated thoroughly the question of the Yakima Indian irrigation matter. That was one of the special subjects your committee was charged with investigating and reporting upon. We have filed a report, House Document No. 505 of the present session. We have investigated the conditions among the Indian tribes on these reservations, and we find that the matter has not been overstated, in our judgment, as to the amount of sickness and disease among the Indians. Some of the tribes are as free from disease as the whites in the surrounding country. Many of them are in worse condition than the whites in the surrounding country.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I want to ask if the committee took any interest in the duplication of work in Muskogee, Okla.? I think it is apparent that for a number of years Muskogee has been carrying on a dual administration that seemed to be unnecessary. I wondered if the committee had taken any means to remedy that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We have an appropriation in the bill that provides that the President shall appoint a commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes, and that that office so created by this bill will utilize all of the records of the two departments that the gentleman speaks of—the Union Agency and the Dawes Commission. There is only one member of the Dawes Commission, Mr. J. George Wright, at the present time, and these two offices will be merged. We will save $4,500 salary and a much larger amount by combining the records of the two offices and dispensing with many clerks.

We believe we will have much more efficient administration than the old administrations under the dual system which the gentleman has mentioned.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs well knows that I am not any longer a member of that committee, but that I still retain a very large interest in these matters. The gentleman will remember that last year there was quite a good deal of controversy, and some of it has even extended to the present time, regarding the administration of the probate estates down there. I wondered if the chairman would let the House know if they are making any effort to remedy that, and what the administration is doing and what the committee is doing in reference to appropriations with respect to that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will say this to the gentleman from Oklahoma, that the present commissioner, Mr. Sells, has recently visited that part of the country—Oklahoma—with a view of looking into these matters. He has had numerous conferences, according to statements we have here in the hearings, and after those conferences with the county judges, with the various county attorneys of that State, and with the attorney general and with the governor of the State, they have come to an agreement with reference to the matter by which they have new rules and regulations promulgated for the government of these estates in the county courts, which are the probate courts of that county; and we feel justified in the conclusion that the matters heretofore complained of will be looked after at once, and that it will be impossible to have any great recurrences—of course it is impossible to keep down individual cases—of complaints that have heretofore been made.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. It is admitted now that there were some evils there?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. No man has ever denied that. Of course there have been some inequalities in the administration of justice down there.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman recall the very able speech of my distinguished friend from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] made last year, which I think was never inserted in the RECORD for permanent embalmment, wherein he denied there were these inequalities?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman from Oklahoma is able to speak for himself.

Mr. MANN. That is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman will yield, I will be very glad to answer that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I want to state to the gentleman from Illinois that I did make quite an extended speech upon that last year, and I did feel keenly some of the things that were said about our State, and I will say now in all frankness that some of the charges then made were true, though not all of them. I am proud to say that our State government and our new Indian Commissioner and the committee itself have brought in an appropriation, and there have been already appointed some seven or eight attorneys, whose duty it shall be to look after these matters. I am also exceedingly sorry to say that all of these tumultuous conditions concerning which the gentleman smilingly makes comment came up while there were 508 Federal employees there on the job safeguarding the Indian's welfare.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman in his speech last year took the liberty of referring in rather pointed language to myself as well as to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], and I wondered if the gentleman from Oklahoma could tell us where we would be able to find a copy of that speech in the RECORD.

Mr. FERRIS. I can tell the gentleman where to find it, but not in the RECORD.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FERRIS. Just one moment before the gentleman yields the floor. I am not intending to speak upon this subject. The chairman of the committee and the House will doubtless remember that last year just before President Taft went out of office he sent the House a long message, which was very well received, indeed, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] and others gave it quite a little attention.

The message concerned the health of the Indians in respect to trachoma and other diseases among them. I vividly recall the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], and I wondered if the committee had taken any action regarding that matter. The chairman has partially answered that in speaking about the hospitals. I wondered if the committee had increased the appropriation any, so that trachoma and other diseases could be properly treated.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, we have given a large lump sum—I think $150,000—in advance of what was given last year, and it is to be used on the reservation in accordance with the report made by the special committee, which has investigated and which has filed its report. They ask for hospitals to be built on reservations nearest to where there is the most disease among the Indians, and this matter, with the one exception of that at Fort Spokane, is left with the department and the Secretary of the Interior. We think we have sufficient funds for them to originate and carry into effect the hospitals; but I desire to state here that we had before us one or two physicians in the Indian Service with whom we disagreed as to the amount that should be expended and as to how it should be expended, for the reason that we do not believe in building large expensive hospitals for the treatment of tuberculosis. We believe it can better be treated by the camp system, as it is called in the West, and we have a model system of that kind at the school in Phoenix, Ariz., where we are prepared to take care of 70 tuberculosis cases, although sometimes we do not have that many there. It is a very efficient, cheap, and splendid way of taking care of these cases.

The same thing can be said about trachoma, and with that disagreement to which I have referred we have the bill in such shape that the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs can provide these hospitals. I think that answers the question.

Mr. FERRIS. It does, and I am happy the Chairman has given that information. I want to ask one further question. Out in my district there is a school called the Rainy Mountain Indian School, and while I was home last year a committee of Indians came down and stated that conditions were in pretty bad shape in that school, and that there ought to be an appropriation made for dormitories, that the children were not properly housed.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. As I remember, that is a reservation school, and there is a lump-sum appropriation of $1,440,000. I think we increased it $40,000.

Mr. FERRIS. It was as to that that I wanted to ask the Chairman. Last year the appropriation was $1,120,000, and this year it was increased to $1,140,000, and I wanted to know if that extra money was intended to remedy that trouble there?

Mr. CARTER. I think a part of it was. I can not recall just how much, but the building of that dormitory, I think, was taken into consideration when the increase of $20,000 was granted.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think the hearings will disclose the exact condition of that Rainy Mountain school.

Mr. CARTER. I called it to the attention of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and he told me he would remedy it.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I want to ask the chairman to what extent the committee on investigation went into the matter of food supply on the reservation. I am interested in that, because of an interview I had with one of the Army surgeons who was visiting a reservation in southern Colorado regarding that matter, and he stated that the Indians were not receiving sufficient food of a nourishing character from the Government, and that their condition of health was largely affected by it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Were they the southern Utes?

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Yes, sir; and the Jacarilla Apaches, who were taken from Arizona and brought into northern New Mexico.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There was no report filed with our committee in regard to that matter. And we would thank any gentleman of the House or of the Senate to give us any information along these lines. That is the reason for our creation, and that is exactly what we are doing.

Does some other gentleman wish to speak on this side?

Mr. MANN. I thought you were going to yield to us?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What time?

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] after that.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I can come after that or wait longer, if you choose.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] one hour.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on this subject. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, four years ago for the thirteenth time we counted ourselves and took an inventory of our possessions.

In political campaigns since that time everyone, whether he had a dollar ahead or not, has been invited to take pride in the fact that we have increased in wealth and population. But it takes altruism beyond the reach of the average man to derive satisfaction from averages in which he participates as a minus quantity, and even the well-to-do are seldom satisfied.

Neither census lists nor party lines define the public mind.

The man to-day who says he is a Republican or a Democrat or a Progressive or a Socialist, and thinks that he thereby wholly classifies himself, is a superficial thinker; and if he happens to hold a political job as a result of the last general election, he holds it not as a concrete result of a crystallization of conviction among a certain number of people but as a fortuitous emergence out of a haze of compromises, prejudices, predilections, personal popularity, and political accidents, except in the South, where Democrats are elected from force of habit.

To define the present state of politics or to draw a line around any particular phase of it and define it in its relation to the whole is to try to define an unclassified, unsettled, kaleidoscopic state of public mind, influenced by various so-called leaders of thought leading in various directions, many of them leading nowhere.

The people themselves are being hurried along before they have reached reasoned conclusions, and Members of Congress frequently represent a confusion of thought of which they are truly representative.

But notwithstanding all the back currents and cross currents and whirlpools of this period of rash speech, headlines, moving pictures, and dissolving views, in which old ideas are encountering new ideas, there is a clear trend toward more direct governmental control by the people and larger individual responsibility.

Here in America we are in the midst of a tangled and difficult industrial and political evolution.

Party lines are zigzag and blurred, and party slogans have lost their old significance.

The maxim that "that government is best which governs least" is obsolete, but at the same time there is a constant tendency to expect too much from government and we are flooded with a multiplicity of statutes.

Constitutional limitations are more and more regarded as constitutional obstructions.

State constitutions are being reduced to the level of statutes, and it is now proposed to overhaul the Federal Constitution and amend it from time to time to meet the public fancy.

CITY PROBLEMS.

Sociology is becoming more and more a part of politics. City problems have become national problems, and the people at large are more concerned about city slums, city pauperism, and city crime than ever before.

The people are concerned about city problems, and city problems have become national problems because 50 per cent of our population is congested in great cities and because this is a Government by majorities, and in a government by majorities one man's judgment at the polls is presumed to be as good as another man's judgment at the polls; and a movement is on foot to nominate Presidents by popular vote.

City problems have become national problems, because there are slums in great cities where criminals, tramps, paupers, prostitutes, and drunkards are reproducing themselves in an atmosphere of crime and squalor, and these slums furnish part of the city vote.

City problems have become national problems because there are crowds in great cities, and crowds breed demagogues, and the words of demagogues breed tempests in the minds of crowds, and crowds will do collectively what no man will do alone.

DISTRIBUTION OF HAPPINESS AND PROPERTY.

Human nature, some advanced thinkers say, is too much hampered by constitutions anyway, and the Constitution of the United States should be so changed that the "inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" should no longer be considered a mere theoretic endowment by the Creator, but should be apportioned and distributed from time to time to all the people by all the people.

Meanwhile, since the majority are not ready for this universal distribution, they say the best way is to elect Presidents who will appoint and Senators who will confirm judges who will feel and respond to the "psychological impact" of public opinion and hold the "general welfare" clause of the Constitution to be an open door for "complete democratization."

These advocates of change are busy promoting innovations, while the average man is busy about his own affairs.

Unless the views of a Cabinet member are held to be negligible the recent declarations of Mr. Wilson, Secretary of Labor, at Seattle, are significant of a possible breach in the supposed safeguards of property erected by Magna Charta, the common law, and the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Wilson, speaking to the Federation of Labor, as reported by the press, said whenever the owner of property—

> Fails to take into consideration the fact that the title has only been conveyed to him as a trustee for the welfare of society, then society has a perfect right to modify or change these titles to property whenever, in its judgment, it deems it for the welfare of society to do it.

This is in somewhat startling contrast with the views of Mr. Justice Story that—

> In a free government almost all other rights would become utterly worthless if the government possessed an uncontrollable power over the private fortunes of every citizen. One of the fundamental objects of every good government must be the due administration of justice; and how vain it would be to speak of such an administration when all property is subject to the will or caprice of the legislature and the rulers.

A REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT.

Down to recent times the Constitution has been regarded as a thing to fight for. It was supposed to be the last and greatest of the landmarks of liberty.

Through all the years of our unprecedented progress stability under a written constitution has been thought essential to the security of life, liberty, and property.

Stability under a written constitution has been supposed to protect the weak and the poor from the encroachments of the rich and the strong.

The Federal Constitution was ordained, published, and ratified as the Constitution of a representative democracy—> which derives all its powers directly or indirectly from the great body of the people, and is administered by persons holding their offices during pleasure for a limited period or during good behavior. (The Federalist, 302.)

The direct democracy of the old New England town meeting could reach no further than a man's voice, and when the Constitution was adopted the thirteen States had long outgrown direct democracy except in local matters.

The writings and speeches of the men who voted to ratify the Constitution in the assemblies of the several States demonstrate the purpose of the framers and the ratifiers of the Constitution to organize a representative form of government and to guarantee to the States a representative form of government.

Therefore, it has been supposed that the constitutional guaranty of a "republican form of government" to every State in the Union meant a guaranty of a representative form of government; and it is laid down by Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, as elementary that it would be revolutionary for a State to abolish a republican form of government.

But now that communication over large areas has become almost instantaneous by telegraph, telephone, and modern mail facilities, and now that the printed word reaches millions almost instantly and constantly, it is claimed that these modes of communication form a substitute for the old town meeting direct-communication method, and a modern adaptation of direct democracy is being inaugurated.

As a result of it legislators, some of whom at least were formerly supposed to be leaders of thought and framers of policies, are tending more and more to be mere political phonographs and punctuators of bills, elevated for a little while upon a diminishing eminence as convenient marks for political missiles.

A GOVERNMENT MUST HAVE ORGANS.

What, then, constitutes a republican form of government? A representative government.

What constitutes a representative government? A government in which the people are represented in the performance of the functions of government.

Mr. Woodrow Wilson, in his work on "Constitutional Government in the United States," puts it this way:

> A government must have organs; it can not act inorganically—by masses. It must have a lawmaking body; it can no more make law through its voters than it can make law through its newspapers (p. 191).

It is obvious that 100,000,000 people can not assemble and make laws for one another; therefore we have a Congress, composed of representatives of the people vested with legislative powers; and since it is obvious that all the people of a State can not assemble and make laws for one another, we have State legislatures. This is the legislative branch of Government.

It is obvious also that 100,000,000 people can not sit in civil and criminal judgment upon one another; therefore we have Federal courts, in which judges, learned in the law, interpret the law and juries pass upon facts.

It is obvious also that the people of a State can not sit in civil and criminal judgment upon one another; therefore we have State courts. This is the judicial branch of Government.

It is obvious also that 100,000,000 people can not all be Presidents of the United States and that all the people of a State can not be governors; therefore we elect Presidents and governors. This is the executive branch of Government.

And these executive, legislative, and judicial branches of Governments are the indispensable "organs" to which Mr. Wilson refers.

THE RECALL.

It becomes necessary at times to remove men from official positions, and Federal and State Constitutions prescribe for their removal after impeachment and conviction; but the process of impeachment is now deemed slow, and has been supplemented by what is known as the recall.

By the recall is meant the right of the electors in any State or municipality to end, by an adverse vote, the services of any officer before the expiration of his term.

It is applied to judges, however, in only two States, California and Oregon, and in cities it is mainly used in conjunction with the commission form of government.

It is generally set in motion by a petition of 25 per cent of the qualified voters and has never been used against a State officer.

It is an agency of administration, not of legislation, and its constitutionality has been invariably upheld by the courts.

It existed for a long time in certain Swiss Cantons, was proposed in America first in the Populist platform of 1892, and first took legislative shape in the charter of Los Angeles in 1903.

It is claimed to be most useful when applied to officials like aldermen, whose duties require them to particularly reflect public sentiment; that it is of doubtful value when applied to officials required to exercise judgment and executive discretion; that it is harmful when applied to judges; that "at its best it has great potentialities for good, but at its worst it contains endless possibilities of political demoralization and harm." (The Initiative, Referendum, and Recall, edited by William Bennett Munro, pp. 47–51.)

THE INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM.

The initiative and referendum are in operation now in 17 States and are pending as proposed amendments to the constitutions of 5 States.

> By the initiative is meant the right of a stated percentage of the voters of any State or municipality to propose both constitutional and ordinary laws to State or municipal legislative bodies and to require that if these be not enacted forthwith by the State or municipal legislature, they shall be submitted for ratification to the whole body of voters. (Munro.)

In Maine and Montana constitutional amendments are excepted from the scope of the initiative.

By the initiative, therefore, constitutions and constitutional amendments may be originated from time to time and laws may be framed or repealed in accordance therewith from time to time upon petition and popular vote.

By the referendum is meant the right of a stated percentage of the voters to demand that measures passed by State and municipal legislative bodies shall be submitted to the voters for acceptance or rejection.

The referendum is not new. Its use for the submission of constitutions and constitutional amendments for ratification or rejection by the people runs back to the submission by Massachusetts of her first constitution in 1778, and the referendum of proposed organic laws has become a custom.

Not only has it been customary to submit proposed organic laws for ratification or rejection, but for more than 50 years it has been customary to submit bonding questions and questions as to location of State capitals and county seats and the prohibition of the liquor traffic.

About this use of the referendum for the determination of large elementary questions of policy and procedure, which can be answered by yes or no, there has been but little controversy.

But the submission of proposed laws with fine and intricate shades of meaning, requiring legal knowledge and research to comprehend their scope, purpose, and effect, has been objected to as a usurpation of legislative power inconsistent with "a republican form of government."

While the initiative and referendum are logically related, their joint use was first authorized by an amendment to the South Dakota constitution in 1898.

These are the agencies of popular government, the extended use of which has become a part of our governmental system; and the time has gone by for argument as to whether they should or should not be a part of that system. They are here.

In discussing them we can not measure their effect by what people say they mean to do with them, but we must measure their effect by what the laws themselves propose to do. Law is a rule of action, and its power is bounded by itself.

COMMENTARIES.

That voters without legal and legislative knowledge should have difficulty in grasping the intricacies of some legislation proposed to them under the initiative and referendum is not surprising in view of the difficulty that eminent statesmen have had in defining what ought to be the scope and limitations of the initiative and referendum themselves.

For illustration, Mr. Wilson, in his work on Constitutional Government, insists that "a government must have organs"; that "it can not act inorganically—by masses"; that "it must have a lawmaking body." (Page 191.)

He further insists that—

It is because we do not look into it and understand it, though it lies at the very heart of our whole practice of government; that we sometimes allow ourselves to assume that the initiative and the referendum, now so much talked of and so imperfectly understood, are a more thorough means of getting at public opinion than the processes of our representative assemblies. (Page 104.)

And he further insists that—

It is this loss of confidence in our local legislatures that has led our people to give so much heed to the radical suggestions of change made by those who advocate the use of the initiative and the referendum in our processes of legislation, the virtual abandonment of the representative principle. (Page 188.)

In these statements, then, the President declares that a government "must have a lawmaking body"; that—

It is because we do not look into it and understand it that we sometimes allow ourselves to assume that the initiative and the referendum are a more thorough means of getting at public opinion than the processes of our representative assemblies.

And finally he declares that "the initiative and referendum are a virtual abandonment of the representative principle."

But in an article called "The issues of reform," published in the North American Review, May, 1910, the President says:

These measures—

The initiative, referendum, and the recall—are supposed to be characteristic of the most radical programs, and they are supposed to be meant to change the very character of our Government. They have no such purpose; their intention is to restore, not to destroy, representative government. * * * The most ardent and successful advocates of the initiative and referendum regard them as a sobering means of obtaining genuine representative action on the part of legislative bodies. They do not mean to set anything aside; they mean to restore and reinvigorate rather.

The proposition that direct legislation is a means of restoration and reinvigoration is difficult to reconcile with the proposition that it is "a virtual abandonment of the representative principle."

In an article in the Outlook, January 21, 1911, Mr. Roosevelt, in discussing the recall, says:

It is sometimes very useful, but it contains undoubted possibilities of mischief, and, of course, it is least necessary in the case of short-term elective officers.

As to the initiative and referendum, he says:

I think that the anticipations of their adherents and the fears of their opponents are equally exaggerated. The value of each depends upon the way it is applied and upon the extent and complexity of the governmental unit to which it is applied.

He says he believes—it would be a good thing to have the principle of the initiative and referendum applied in most of our States, always provided that it be so safeguarded as to prevent its being used wantonly or in a spirit of levity. In other words—if the legislature fails to act one way or the other on some bill as to which there is a genuine popular demand, then there should unquestionably be a power in the people through their initiative to compel such action.

He says—

Similarly in any bill important enough to arouse genuine public interest there should be power for the people to insist upon the bill being referred to popular vote, so that the constituents may authoritatively determine whether or not their representatives have misrepresented them. But if it is rendered too easy to invoke either process, the result can be only mischievous.

Mr. Roosevelt adds:

There are plenty of cases in which on a given issue of sufficient importance it is better that the people should decide for themselves rather than trust the decision to a body of representatives, and our present-day acceptance of this fact is shown by our insistence upon a direct vote of the State when the State adopts a new constitution.

Mr. Roosevelt states the case clearly and convincingly, but he encounters difficulty in indicating at what point the law ceases to be wholesome and begins to be "mischievous."

When he argues that we indicate our willingness to have important issues submitted to the people by submitting constitutions to the States for direct vote, he might have gone further and said that constitutions and constitutional amendments have been submitted to the people for more than a hundred years and bonding questions and questions of location of State capitals and questions of location of county seats and questions of prohibition of the liquor traffic have been submitted for more than 50 years.

No one has doubted the wisdom of submitting these large, elementary questions, although everybody knows that the provisions of constitutions and the scope of amendments proposed are not, as a rule, fully understood by any considerable number of those who vote on them.

The difficulty arises in connection with less simple and elementary legislation, and Mr. Roosevelt proceeds to discuss this difficulty in these words:

But ordinary citizens in private life—such as the present writer and most of his readers—neither can nor ought to spend their time in following all the minutiæ of legislation.

This work they ought to delegate to the legislators who are to make it their special business, and if scores of special bills are habitually presented for popular approval or disapproval at every election it is not probable that good will come, and it is certain that the percentage of wise decisions by the people will be less than if only a few propositions of really great importance are presented.

It is necessary to guard not only against the cranks and well-meaning busybodies with fads, but also against the extreme laxity with which men are accustomed to sign petitions.

Mr. Roosevelt then suggests that—

Those who anticipate too much from the new system, however, would do well to study its workings in Switzerland.

And then cites a case where the people demanded certain legislation on the initiative, and all the legislature voted for it except one man, who was beaten at the polls for voting against it, and then on the referendum the people defeated the bill itself and vindicated the judgment of the one man.

After citing this illustration of the eccentricities of direct legislation, Mr. Roosevelt says:

Unquestionably an ideal representative body is the best imaginable legislative body. Such a body, if composed of unusual courage, intelligence, sympathy, and high-mindedness, anxious to represent the people and at the same time conscientious in their determination to do nothing that is wrong, would so act that there would never come the slightest demand for any change in the methods of enacting laws.

ANALYSIS.

Apparently neither President Wilson nor ex-President Roosevelt has reached any clear conclusion as to how far these laws should go. It would probably be impossible for them to do so, except in general terms, and the working out and final perfection of the system must be left to the good sense of the people after practical trial.

Mr. Roosevelt regards the recall as "something very useful," but as containing "undoubted possibilities of mischief." He would "have the principle of the initiative and the referendum applied in most of our States," but "so safeguarded as to prevent its being used wantonly or in a spirit of levity."

That is, as he explains, he would have the initiative as a reserve power to compel legislation in matters where "there is a genuine popular demand," and he would have the referendum ready to enable the people to determine "whether or not their representatives have misrepresented them," and to this I think most of us will agree.

But he says:

If it is rendered too easy to invoke either process, the result can be only mischievous.

He would restrict the use of the initiative and the referendum to "issues of sufficient importance" and leave to the legislators "the minutiæ of legislation," because private citizens "neither can nor ought to spend their time in following" them, and because "it is certain that the percentage of wise decisions of the people will be less if scores of special bills are habitually presented" to them "than if only a few propositions of really great importance are presented."

But it is amazing how men differ on what constitutes "issues of sufficient importance"; and Mr. Roosevelt has already reminded us of the propensities of cranks and well-meaning busybodies with fads and how easy it is for men to sign petitions.

There is no middle ground between a law that goes too far and a law that does not go far enough. There can be no limitation upon the power of the law except the law itself and the Constitution.

If you have a recall law, it is a recall law, and has both the possibilities for good and the possibilities for mischief which Mr. Roosevelt describes.

Whether it is used for good must depend upon the good sense of the people who use it. Upon their good sense, then, would depend the tenure of officers and "the fearlessness and independence of judge, governor, Senator, and Congressman" which Mr. Roosevelt eulogizes, might easily get them into trouble, and get them recalled by people who might want to take advantage of "the powers of mischief" which Mr. Roosevelt describes.

Mr. Roosevelt would have the principle of the initiative and the referendum "so safeguarded as to prevent its being used wantonly or in a spirit of levity," and he would not apply it to small matters, but only to large matters.

But a law is a law and contains within itself its own limitation, subject to the Constitution.

You can say that the principle of the initiative and the referendum shall be applied specifically only to constitutions and constitutional amendments, to bond issues, capital locations, county-seat locations, and to the liquor traffic, just as it is now; but you can not say that it shall be applied only to big laws and not to small laws, to laws that seem simple and not to laws that seem complex.

The application of a law must be definite, just as the law itself must be definite.

You can say that a petition for the initiative and the referendum shall be started by a large or a small percentage of voters, but you can not say in what spirit, whether of levity or otherwise, it shall be started.

RELIANCE UPON THE COMMON SENSE OF THE PEOPLE.

It is clear also that intelligent legislation requires study and deliberation and that when a multitude of matters are presented to the people, few of whom are skilled in legislation, only large matters, where lines of policy and lines of right and wrong are clearly drawn, are likely to receive adequate and discriminating attention. Most men are busy about their own affairs and consider public problems vaguely, intermittently, and on the run.

The solemnity of an oath helps to steady legislators to their task. The Constitution of the United States provides that Members of Congress and members of State legislatures shall be bound by oath to support the Constitution, and objection is made that under the new system no oath is required. But there is a difference between representative legislation and direct legislation. The representative holds a commission from the people. Direct voters are the people. Men do not have to be sworn to determine what they want or do not want and can be trusted to vote for what they conceive their interests dictate when they understand them.

Objection is made that the Federal and certain State Constitutions provide that a man shall reach a certain age before he shall be deemed old enough to know how to legislate, but that this new system presumes that every voter 21 years old is old enough and wise enough to make laws, whether he is fully naturalized or not.

There is force in this, and yet this system involves the same old majority proposition upon which our Government rests, and the average of common sense must still be relied upon to steady us to just conclusions.

The Federal Constitution was ordained, published, and ratified as the Constitution of a representative democracy.

The power of the people to make or amend constitutions is defined by the Constitution, and they "must not abolish the republican form of government, since such act would be revolutionary in its character and would call for and demand intervention on the part of the Government of the United States." (Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, p. 44.)

But the Supreme Court has held that the question of whether direct legislation is in conflict with a republican form of government is a legislative and political question and not a judicial question (Luther v. Borden, 7 How., 1; Pacific States Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Oregon, 223 U. S., 118); and whether direct legislation is constitutional or not, and without considering whether the people have considered the question of constitutionality, the fact remains that direct legislation has so gained in popularity that a great body of the people have already practically foreclosed the question.

Discussion of direct legislation therefore is discussion after the fact, and I am referring to it now only as part of an attempted judicial analysis of an evolution so rapid that even we who are a part of it scarcely realize it.

NEED OF PATRIOTISM AND STEADINESS OF JUDGMENT.

We have already reached the point where the average man, with or without knowledge or training, is more and more being called upon to weigh, analyze, and understand his own relation to government.

We have reached this point at a time when the Congress of the United States and the legislatures of 48 States, 2 Territories, the District of Columbia, the Canal Zone, Porto Rico, and Philippine Islands are constantly making new laws and when Federal, State, Territorial, and other courts are constantly rendering new decisions, the scope and underlying principles of which even the ablest lawyers understand only in part after exhaustive study.

We have reached this point when all thinking men recognize as never before the need of more uniformity of State and Territorial laws.

For men to weigh, analyze, and understand legislation and court decisions and their own relation to government now requires a knowledge which comparatively few lawyers and students of history adequately possess. Even superficial knowledge in this respect, in a large and complicated government like our own, requires a studious consideration, a steadiness of judgment, and a sobriety of patriotism which has never yet been required of the average man in any nation, and this judgment and patriotism are required of a population of mixed elements, not yet fused, nearly 50 per cent of whom are congested in great cities.

To achieve even remotely this high requirement all voters should vote on proposed legislation, and vote intelligently; but, so far, voters have not shown a just appreciation of their high responsibility as legislators.

To achieve even in part this high requirement all voters should vote, and vote intelligently, for or against candidates at the primaries and at elections; but, so far, easily 50 per cent of voters have been in the habit of staying away from the polls and allowing minorities and congested centers to dictate nominations and elections.

In this connection the length of a ballot is a matter of no small importance. Few voters know or can know, even in a general way, the character and qualifications of candidates whose names appear upon the ballots handed them when they enter the voting booth.

To achieve even in part this high requirement all offices should be open to the aspirations of poor men as well as rich men, but it is a well-known fact that the cost of a double election constantly deters poor men from becoming candidates.

THE CHURCHES AND THE SCHOOLS.

It is a conservative statement to say that we have already entered upon a crisis that will test the capacity of government by majorities to govern itself as never before.

In this test the churches and the schools—the preachers and the teachers—are exercising and must exercise an influence which may be for the salvation of this Republic.

Governmental science studies ways and means of government. Philosophy groups scientific facts, considers our present tendencies, and speculates upon ultimate results. The schools fit us for intelligent citizenship and the church instills in men and women morality, just treatment of one another, and helps them to understand that clean and honest lives not only make us better and happier citizens here, but give purpose and nobility to human existence in its relation to the hereafter.

Our Government, if it continues to be a Government, must reside in the brains, hearts, and consciences of our citizens. We are a Government in which one man's judgment at the polls is presumed to be as good as another man's judgment at the polls, and this presumption is being extended to legislation.

So long as the best in man is uppermost and so long as the best men are uppermost, we shall continue to go forward on the upgrade, but if we fail the hope of the world fails.

Therefore the moral and intellectual instruction of men and women is a matter of supreme importance in a supremely important time.

CORRUPTION NONPARTISAN.

In spite of all the writings of specialists in corruption, I am one of those who believe the world is growing better.

I know the average man wants to do right, and the rank and file of political parties are not corrupt. To say they are would be to indict a whole nation.

The man temporarily intrusted with power here in Washington, or in any State capital, makes a mistake if he supposes the people as a whole are not keenly alive to the moral questions involved in politics.

For some time it has been the custom in political campaigns for country audiences to be told by city talkers that they are being oppressed and misled by bosses, but the political boss is not a country product and fortunately the country can not be gauged by city standards.

If a half dozen big cities in this country could be induced to clean up, it would raise the level of political decency throughout the country by more than 50 per cent.

We are told that the purification of politics can be achieved by the translation of old corrupt bosses from old associations which they themselves have corrupted into new associations of their old associates, and that by translation both bosses and associates will become incorruptible.

I hope so. But corruption is nonpartisan. It has no partisan prejudices.

It came into the world when the snake first crawled through the garden fence and commenced a conversation with the first woman on the subject of fruit.

There is an invisible line somewhere on the sides of mountains above which snakes and vermin can not live, and there is an altitude of morality and decency in which crooked things can not live, but it is well up toward heaven, and no part of its population derives sustenance from political jobs.

SOCIALISM.

Travelers for a day, we are carried along in a vast movement, the end of which no one can foresee.

The irresistible current of time is sweeping us away from the old order of things into new regions of thought and action.

In his "Democracy and Liberty" Mr. Lecky observes that—

In any forecast that may be attempted of the probable influence of democracy in the world a prominent place must be given to its relation to labor questions, and especially to those socialistic theories which during the last 20 years have acquired a vastly extended influence on political speculation and political action.

Mr. Lecky wrote that 18 years ago, and since that time Socialism has not ceased to extend itself.

The thinking Socialist is not to be confused with the little man in politics who floats on movements hoping to float into a job, and he is not to be confused with his follower, the ranter on the curb, who mistakes his prejudices for principles and his emotions for public movements.

He is a man with a purpose, a student of history, a student of constitutions, and he has no great reverence for antiquity.

Socialism was first called socialism in 1836, but it existed long before it received its name—in Plato's ideal republic; in the dreams of the Hebrew prophets of a government built on religion; in the equality of prince and pauper in the monasteries; in the preachings of John Ball, of Kent; in More's "Utopia"; in Campanella's "City of the Sun"; in Bacon's "New Atlantis"; in the promises of Jack Cade; in the experiments of Robert Owen; and the philosophy of Rousseau, St. Simon, Comtè, and Fourier.

So-called modern scientific socialism was generated out of ideas about property and the State toward the close of the eighteenth century in France in the course of speculations then in vogue on the origin and objects of civil society, and was finally reduced to systematic form by Karl Marx and Ferdinand Lassalle and formulated in many programs.

It covers many sects and many shades of opinion from the extreme views of Marx about property and the family to the milder form of so-called democratic socialism, and is not capable of precise definition.

John Morley says it is—

An aspiration for the destruction of inequalities in social conditions by an economic transformation.

Speaking broadly—

Dr. Lyman Abbott says—the socialist is one who believes that the present social system is wrong and needs to be radically changed. He is not content merely with teaching the wage earner and his employer to treat each other with justice and consideration; he believes that the wage system is wrong and must give place to a better system. (Outlook, Mar. 7, 1908.)

But when the question is asked, What system will be put in its place? socialists divide into different groups.

And Dr. Abbott agrees with other writers in describing these groups as Christian socialists, democratic socialists, and radical or state socialists.

Commenting upon Mr. R. J. Campbell's definition of radical or state socialism, in his book on Christianity and the Social Order, that—the Nation should be one great producing firm with every citizen as a shareholder—

Dr. Abbott says state socialism—is unjust because it takes the whole of the product for the community. It is a form of slavery, with the community for the master.

The difference between state socialism and what we have called democratic socialism—

He says—

is exactly this: Democratic socialism is voluntary cooperation in industry, and is to be encouraged; state socialism is compulsory cooperation in industry, and compulsory cooperation is unjust, whether the compulsion be enforced by despotic capital, compelling the labor by threat of starvation, or by a labor union forbidding free labor under the same penalty, or by the State owning all the implements of industry and controlling all its activities.

Democratic socialism—

He says—

proposes to substitute for individualistic industry and unlimited competition associated industry, cooperating for mutual benefit. First steps toward the realization of this ideal are now being taken by men who would resent indignantly the title of socialists.

He quotes Mr. Thomas Kirkup in his book, An Inquiry Into Socialism, as saying:

Education, post office, telegraphs, highway, and water have all passed or are passing from private to public control, and in some countries railways.

And adds:

Corporations are in this sense essentially socialistic contrivances by which a great many persons combine in the ownership and control of enterprises too great for any one man's ownership or administration. By the corporation capital is concentrated for the purpose of administration, but divided as to profits. A next and not unnatural step will be taken when the laborers under the corporation become themselves the stockholders in the corporation.

As bearing upon the program of Democratic socialism, Prof. Weyl, in his book The New Democracy, says:

The industrial goal of the democracy is the socialization of industry. It is the attainment by the people of the largest possible industrial control and of the largest possible industrial dividend. The democracy seeks to attain those ends through Government ownership of industry; through Government regulation; through tax reform; through a moralization and reorganization of business in the interest of the industrially weak.

He proceeds then to file a bill of particulars of "industrial developments in the general direction of this goal."

Government—

He says—

goes into business. The Post Office embarks upon the banking business and threatens to engage in the express business.

The Forestry Bureau raises and sells timber. The Reclamation Service goes into many separate businesses in connection with the building of dams and the selling of water.

In the construction of the Panama Canal the Government builds roads and railroads and conducts dozens of separate enterprises.

At the same time the States and cities greatly extend the sphere of their direct participation in business and buy and manufacture and sell on an enlarging scale.

He then proceeds to show the growth of Government regulation of railroads and corporations generally and dwells upon the "new insistence" which is being "laid upon the social interest in all manifestations of our industrial life."

It is part of the program of what Prof. Weyl calls "the new Democracy."

1. That a large majority of our people are owners of "some little wealth," and that this is a guaranty of social order and binds everybody over to keep the peace while a peaceful revolution is being brought about by the ballot. (Page 256.)

2. That violence is clumsy, and that revolution must proceed along constitutional and legal lines, making its own constitutions and laws as it goes. (Page 267.)

3. That this movement does not favor confiscation, because its own majority has property, but that it does involve a gradual but rapid transformation, to be brought about by the uniting of various "groups" for the "crowding out" of an undesirable minority. (Page 256.)

4. That by this method it proposes to attack "swollen" fortunes; monopoly, which leads to "swollen" fortunes; "special privilege," which increases them; unequal taxation, which conserves them; and business oligarchy, which perpetuates them. (Page 264.)

5. That "by such indirect means, which after all are the means adopted by the people, even a revolution may be safe, sane, and conservative," and "we may change the very bases of our government, law, and business." (Page 268.)

In this way, he says, "We may jump the hurdles of the Constitution and circumvent the obstacles of a mass of antiquated judicial decisions."

SAFEGUARDS.

These movements mark the course of currents which run deeper than the loud humbug of surface politics, deeper than political administrations, with their distribution of patronage, their shuffling of political cards, and their rearrangement of political stage furniture; deeper even than the forms of government. "Governments are but the mechanism of the modes in which nations exist."

Whether we shall live and go on—whether we shall permanently endure—depends not primarily on what kind of Presidents we have, not on what kind of Congresses we have, not on what kind of courts we have, except as Presidents, Congresses, and courts express what kind of people we are.

The good sense and conscience of the people are our title deeds and police force.

Upon their wisdom and self-restraint our permanence depends. Revising laws does not revise society. On the contrary, society revises laws. Laws and forms of government are necessary, but the spirit of the people gives vitality to law and character to civilization.

No constitution can hold us together as a national entity unless we uphold and sustain it. Mexico has a constitution.

What I am trying to say here to-day will not be entirely without value if I can impress upon the average man his increasing responsibility for the welfare and stability of our Republic.

Bryce likens our States, in what Cooley calls our "indestructible Union composed of indestructible States," to the water-tight compartments of an ocean-going ship, and argues that one compartment after another may be stove in and the ship ride out the storm; but our danger is not so much from without as from within.

Humanity on its long journey down the ages has come at last to this Republic, where the ideals of former times have passed into the enacted laws of liberty.

And liberty is still developing greater liberty, but in the eternal aspiration of mankind for something better let us be careful not to take down the safeguards which separate liberty from license.

Let us be careful not to take down the safeguards by which we ought to guard ourselves against our own impulses.

Time and again in history we have seen reaction swing to revolution and back again. Time and again we have seen the people swept beyond excess and then fall back into indifference.

Men make good resolutions to strengthen themselves against their own impulses, and nations make laws in times of calm judgment to restrain themselves in times of violence.

We need, too, to guard against insidious and indirect encroachment upon our governmental structure.

Washington warned us in his Farewell Address that—

> One method of assault may be to effect in the forms of the Constitution alterations which will impair the energy of the system, and thus undermine what can not be directly overcome.

The tendency to the loosening of constitutional restraints is a state of mind which few who are influenced by it stop to analyze—an intangible thing which slips through our fingers when we try to grasp it.

It will not do to delude ourselves about the "popular voice."

Lieber has analyzed the "vox populi." Le Bon has analyzed "crowd psychology." Bishop Butler has commented on the "insanity of States."

Hooker, in his Ecclesiastical Polity, warned us against "the demagogue who goes about to convince the multitude that they are not as well governed as he himself would govern them."

We have a moving object lesson in every campaign of "people's friends" whose ideas of political economy are bounded by a party platform and who pronounce the word "people" with hypocritical unction.

We know that we are apt to draw hastily formed conclusions from a superficial examination of the more prominent features of questions, and our omnipresent journalism is constantly spreading before us every hour of every day moving pictures of human credulity.

Discussing crowd psychology, an editorial writer of the Chicago Tribune, November 26, 1911, said:

> It is no disparagement of the democratic principle to take this vital fact (crowd psychology) into account. Just as the individual is capable under its influence of doing things not natural to him, to his great regret thereafter, and therefore must wish for a check upon himself, so a wise nation, truly democratic in its ideals, must desire in its institutions provisions based on the known facts of our psychology, individual and collective, to protect itself against dangers arising from its inherent nature. We have the loose-tongued politician or circulation-seeking journalist who takes the other extreme—that the popular voice is always right; that popular opinion is sacred; that government should express immediately every fluctuant impulse of popular thought or emotion. This flattering of the voters and of readers is supposed to be very effective, but it is the method of the demagogue and not the real friend of popular government.

THE GENERAL WELFARE MUST MEAN THE INDIVIDUAL WELFARE.

Whether the millennium is a mirage that always moves before us or an ultimate fact, I do not doubt that if 500 years ago mankind had been told that there would come a time in 1900 when torture would be impossible among civilized men; when there would be a court for the settlement of international disputes; when the weak would be protected against the strong; when the scales of justice would be held impartially; when brute strength and mailed privilege would no longer dominate mankind; when printing would unfold knowledge to all, high and low, to be acquired in proportion to diligence and talent; when the average of human honesty would be as high as now; when the brotherhood of man would begin to be a working fact; when organized benevolence and humanitarianism would be a part of social life; when the sick, the weak, the unfortunate, the feeble-minded, the insane, the deaf, the dumb, and the blind would be cared for by organized society—if 500 years ago men had been told that such a time would come, I do not doubt that they would have hailed it as the millennium.

In spite of this there are men, like Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace, who insist that "the result of man's power to utilize the forces of nature has been almost wholly evil"; that "the increase of the world's wealth has been distributed with gross injustice"; and that "huge cities have grown up with overcrowded insanitary slums, where men, women, and children die prematurely as surely as though a body of secret poisoners were constantly at work to destroy them."

And yet for this very condition the people who suffer from it are in part responsible.

Throughout this Nation, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, there is healthy, wholesome work to do upon the farms. It is the constant complaint of farmers that the people in cities will not come out and work, and there ought to be some means of systematic inducement to the distribution of surplus city population throughout the country. There are thousands of acres in the South and West that can still be bought cheap, on easy terms, where men and women can build homes of peace and plenty and rear their children in sight of the American schoolhouse under the American flag.

Notwithstanding evils which we admit and decry, the world is growing better.

Humanity makes mistakes—tragic mistakes—makes apologies in one age for the wrongs it did in a former age, and builds monuments to martyrs out of the stones wherewith it stoned them.

But in the long sweep of time the universal aspiration of mankind is upward, and the universal prayer of mankind going up to the throne of God is for better things.

Reading the signs of our times in the light of the eternal purpose running through the ages I can not doubt they mean continued human advancement, although with our finite faculty groping in the midst of change we may not understand just how.

But this much is certain, that the comfort and happiness of all mean the comfort and happiness of each. No rightly constituted man can close his senses to the troubles of others.

The general welfare must mean the individual welfare, and it must continue to be in the future, as it has been in the past, that the welfare of the great mass of mankind is paramount and that the interests of the few can not be weighed in the scales of God against the interests of the many.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PAIGE].

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. NORTON. Five minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] after that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PAIGE] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say at this time, in reply to the statement of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], that I am not a calamity howler, nor a bird of ill omen, as referred to by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama. I am anxious to see the business of the country prosperous whether under a Democratic or a Republican administration, but the statement of the gentleman from Georgia, who, on February 4, in this House, referred to the conditions of business in some of the towns in my district, is misleading.

He stated that in the town of Webster 1,000 hands had received a raise of wages. I have taken pains to ascertain the facts of that statement, and I desire to read from a letter that I have received from a woolen manufacturer of that town:

> Not over 50 per cent of the total woolen and worsted looms running in Webster and Dudley. (By way of parenthesis I wish to say that the town of Dudley mentioned here is the adjoining town of Webster.)
> Orders on hand compared with last year not over 30 per cent.
>
> No increase in wages by anyone. Never for years so many people seeking work personally and by letter asking for employment for themselves and family. Business has not been so slow in Webster and Dudley and surrounding towns for years.
>
> This mill employs, running full, about 220 hands; pay roll about $130,000 a year; present rate about $100,000 a year. Unless times improve we will not be employing more than 100 hands next fall; pay roll for the year about $70,000. If this is so, we shall run out the stock, shut down, and when we start up start on Grover Cleveland wage list, as we are now selling our goods below the prices we received then.
> Our help averaged under Grover Cleveland a little less than $240 per year.

My colleague from Georgia also stated that in the adjoining town of Grosvenorsdale, Conn.—Webster being near the Connecticut State line—the employees there had had their wages raised equal to 25 per cent. Now, the facts of the case are these: They did have their wages raised 5 per cent, but a law went into effect in Connecticut on January 1 reducing the hours of labor from 60 to 54 hours per week, which, figured on that basis, would make about 15 per cent rather than 25 per cent.

I also desire to read a letter from Orange, Mass., which town is in the district I represent, in which the writer says:

> We are enjoying a sample of Democratic prosperity, as business is very poor in all the factories here, and the New Home Sewing Machine Co.'s works, one of the largest in the country, are running four days per week and eight hours per day.

I refer to these facts for no other reason than I feel it a duty that I owe my constituents, who, I can not believe, would desire me to remain silent and allow the statements of the gentleman from Georgia to go unchallenged without stating the facts as they exist.

I want to be fair in the matter and to state that in my own town of Southbridge, a large manufacturing town, I consider business at the present time about normal, but in many of the towns of the district which I represent the business is far below normal.

The distinguished Speaker of this House, for whom I have the greatest admiration, is reported to have said a short time ago in Boston, speaking, as I suppose, for the Democratic Party, of which he is one of the most able and likable members, that if the tariff and currency bills work out all right, "we are all right," but if they work out wrong, "we are all wrong."

That I believe to be true, and I think the point has not been reached where any man on the floor of this House, belonging to either party, can absolutely state how they are going to work out.

The Republicans believe that the present tariff bill will work disaster to our industries as has been the case every time this country has gone upon a low-tariff basis, and the fact that our Democratic friends cite instances, here and there, where business is normal or where there may have been an increase in wages does not alter the fact, in my opinion and judgment, as to what the final outcome will be, although I trust I may be mistaken in my impressions. I desire to insert in the RECORD an article from the Boston Weekly Globe of February 4, 1914:

[From the Boston Evening Globe, Feb. 4, 1914.]

FOR UNEMPLOYED OF BOSTON—MORRISON I. SWIFT AND OTHERS APPEAL TO MAYOR CURLEY, WHO LIKES IDEA OF STATE HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION.

Morrison I. Swift, accompanied by Patrick Flynn, Caleb F. Howard, and Anthony Ivas, called on Mayor Curley in regard to the unemployed of Boston, who, according to Mr. Swift, number 20,000.

In the first place, the mayor granted them a permit for the use of the Parkman Memorial Bandstand on the Common for speech making at 2.30 p. m. on Saturday.

In regard to a request to start the making of State highways to give employment to the unemployed, the mayor promised to confer with Gov. Walsh in regard to the matter and urge such construction.

In regard to having the city furnish meals to the unemployed, the mayor assured them that the condition of the city's finances at present is such that he is thankful to be able to pay wages to those who are working for it.

The mayor promised to look further into the request that the armories of the city be thrown open to the unhoused among the unemployed of Boston.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the speech I intend making, you will discover, is not for "home consumption," but I do not doubt that it will have a home discussion. I am going to make this speech because I think what I am going to say ought here to be said, as necessary to convince you of a right program of legislation as relates to the Five Civilized Tribes.

Some transactions in our State for the past 12 or 15 years have been subject to much criticism—a reflection upon the people of the State, upon the tribes interested, and upon the chief executives of those tribes who are directly responsible.

Before going into the subject, however, I want to take the liberty of calling the attention of Congress to the difference between Indian tribes as being quite as great as between other races. The Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma are quite distinct from the prairie tribes on the west side of the State or in other sections of the country, who wear blankets and who are the subject of hero stories of the wild West of which you read. Three of these tribes were never savages—the Chickasaws, the Choctaws, and the Cherokees. There is only one other civilized tribe, and that is the Pueblo, and possibly the Navajo. The Five Civilized Tribes and the Pueblo Tribe are the only Indian tribes that hold their land in fee simple. The Pueblos of Arizona and New Mexico were given a grant by Spain, ratified later by Mexico, and then by the United States. The Five Civilized Tribes have held their land in fee simple since long prior to the Civil War. They have had civil governments fully officered with chief executives, legislatures, courts, and public schools, operated by themselves, controlled without any supervision of the Government or of Congress, ran ad libitum by themselves. Their courts, while crude in a measure, gave manifest justice. I hold in my hand a printed copy of the Chickasaw statutes, enacted by their legislature, and enforced in their court.

Three of these tribes have produced three very great men. The Cherokees produced Sequoyah, a great genius, who made a logarithmic table and an alphabet of 86 letters to represent the 86 sounds of their language, in which no letter represented more than one sound, and there were no silents. It was so perfect that a man who knew the alphabet could not miss spelling a word. Very shortly his statue will be in the Hall of Fame in this building, placed there by the people of the State of Oklahoma.

The Chickasaw Tribe can claim merit for the production of Tishomingo, a statesman and patriot, the father and George Washington of the tribe.

The Choctaws can claim credit for the great and renowned executive, statesman, general, orator, and philosopher, Apush-ma-ta-ha, who, according to the Alabama Historical Records, died in Washington City while on a visit as a delegate representing his people, near 12 o'clock p. m., December 23, 1824, and that he was succeeded in the early part of the following year by his nephew, Oklahoma, from whom the name of our State was derived. I may add that Apush-ma-ta-ha's body now rests in the Congressional Cemetery at Washington City, surrounded by the remains of many of the notables of this Republic, and that a monument marks his resting place bearing appropriate inscription.

First side:

Apushmataha, Choctaw chief, lies here. This monument to his memory is erected by his brother chiefs who were associated with him in a delegation from their nation in the year 1824 to the General Government of the United States.

Second side is blank.

Third side is marked:

He died in Washington on the 24th day of December, 1824, of the croup, in the sixtieth year of his age. Among his last words were the following: "When I am gone let the big guns be fired over me."

(It may be noted that his request was granted by the Secretary of War, because "Push" had been an officer in the United States Army.)

Fourth side is marked:

Pushmataha was a warrior of great distinction. He was wise in council, eloquent in an extraordinary degree, and on all occasions and under all circumstances the white man's friend.

If we judge from the standpoint of executive ability, from courage and self-reliance in battle, from an intuitive knowledge of the rights of men, Apush-ma-ta-ha was the greatest Indian, although a full blood, who ever lived. Upon making the purchase of the southern half of Oklahoma, the records show that he had a better understanding of the possessions of the United States than existed in the records of the Government itself, and pointed out to Gen. Jackson that he was trying to sell them the Panhandle of Texas, then Mexican territory. He also pointed out that there lived within that region many white men of property, who could not be removed on account of vested interests in the section.

It is of interest to learn how Apush-ma-ta-ha got his name. No one knew of his origin, and when the chief wanted to bestow upon him a war name for brave achievements, he declined until all such names in the beaded list of the medicine man, or priest, were exhausted, and then was told, "None left in the bag," by which he was called Apush-ma-ta-ha, meaning that he had won all war names and was entitled to more.

He was in the Battle of New Orleans, and an officer in the United States Army, and executed the plans of campaign against the Creeks and Seminoles in Florida.

As a further undisputed proof of the services of the Indian in the wars of the United States you will find in the treaty of October 18, 1820, in the eleventh article of that treaty, a stipulation that the "Choctaw chiefs and warriors who have not received compensation for their services during the campaign to Pensacola in the late war shall be paid whatever is due them."

You will find again in the treaty with the Choctaws in 1825, article 6, a second promise to pay these soldiers and an acknowledgment that payment had been delayed; and then again in the treaty of 1830, known as the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, you will find in article 21 this statement: "A few Choctaw warriors yet survive who marched and fought in the army with Gen. Wayne [no doubt the American Revolution] and who number not exceeding 20. These it is agreed shall hereafter, while they live, receive $25 a year."

Nor is this all the evidence of their services to their country in the wars of the United States. While in the Civil War the Five Civilized Tribes, for the most part, and especially the Chickasaws and Choctaws, joined the Confederacy, the historian J. B. Thoburn has discovered and written in the history of Oklahoma the startling fact that Capt. Tandy C. Walker, a quarter-blood Indian and a half brother to Gov. D. H. Johnston, was the youngest brigadier general in the Confederate Army. His son, Theodore Walker, is an expert gunner now in the naval fleet constituting the Pacific squadron.

Mr. Clayborne, a historian, once a Member of Congress, in 1830 said that he had heard all the orators of this Republic, but that Apush-ma-ta-ha was the greatest of them all; that on account of the music of his voice the Indians called him "Waterfall;" that he would have adorned the United States Senate, and that had he been a Member his sayings would have gone down to posterity, and that future generations would have looked upon him as we look upon the Greek statesmen.

I give this bit of history in order that Congress may understand that there ought to be a distinction between these tribes and others in the matter of legislation. And now I am going to call attention to some very delicate matters. You have often heard criticism of the $750,000 fee paid Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish and other supposed graft. The Indians paid this; they got value received and are satisfied with it.

This began in the Chickasaw Nation. In my opinion that tribe surpassed all others:

First. For the reason, as Thomas Jefferson said, the Chickasaws were the only tribe of Indians that would fight in open field of battle.

Second. They can manage public business, and have managed their public business better than the United States.

Third. To show their business ability, when the Civil War closed they had more slaves than there were men, women, and children in the tribe, showing their ability to accumulate; and this, too, not by the aid of the Government but by its positive noninterference, as the result of their savings in a western country surrounded by hostile tribes.

Fourth. They had the cleanest citizenship rolls, clean of fraud and graft, and better than the rolls made by the Government for the other tribes.

Fifth. They created a more nearly perfect equality of government. When the break-up came in 1896 there were neither millionaires nor paupers in that tribe. When the break-up came they had more than $1,000,000 of trust funds to their credit under Government control, under the Indians' direction, as I will show you in a moment. That million dollars has been squandered since 1896 by this Government.

Sixth. They expend more money for education than any other people on this globe. They established primary schools and maintained them with their own funds until the break-up came in 1896. They gave every child who attended the school $8 a month to go, based upon actual attendance—the greatest compulsory educational law in the world. They furnished free textbooks, and when the child left that grade they had two male and two female colleges, and when they passed that stage they gave them $30 a month to go into the States or anywhere and become further educated. Congressman CARTER was educated in one of those higher institutions of that tribe. In addition, they had an orphan's home, all maintained out of their own funds, without the interference or supervision of the United States Government.

They have made treaties with the Government since 1786. I hold in my hand a copy of the treaty of 1834; and, mind you, the first suggestion ever made to educate the Indian at public expense was made by Apush-ma-ta-ha on the part of the Choctaws on October 18, 1820, wherein he wrung from Gen. Jackson an agreement that 54 sections of their land in Mississippi should be sold by the Government, with the principal held in trust in perpetuity and the proceeds applied to the education of their children. And he said when the treaty was made:

> I predict the time will come in this country when the Indian will be holding offices in the white man's government and fighting in the white man's wars.

How true that prediction. B. H. Colbert, of my town, a Chickasaw-Choctaw Indian, became the orderly of Theodore Roosevelt in the Spanish-American War. There were 25 of these Indians who were Rough Riders in my section.

The next step in education was the treaty of 1834 made with the Chickasaws, at their suggestion, whereby funds should be set apart for education.

Now, with these preliminary remarks, I want to show what they have done for themselves and what the Government has "done to them." Here is a treaty made in 1852. In the second article of that treaty—notice this astounding language—when these Indians moved from near Memphis to the West they agreed when they traded a portion of that land that the remaining land should be sold and the proceeds invested by the Government. After they moved west and turned that property over wholly to the Government we find this treaty of 1852. I quote from article 2 as follows:

> The expense attending the sale of the lands ceded by the Chickasaws to the United States under the treaty of 1832 having for some time past exceeded the receipts, it is agreed that the remaining land so ceded shall be disposed of by the Government as speedily as possible—

And an accounting made to the Indians.

Then, in article 4:

> The Chickasaws allege that in the management and disbursement of their funds by the Government they have been subject to losses and expenses which properly should have been borne by the United States. * * * It is therefore agreed that the United States shall make an accounting of these funds—

Giving the Indians an opportunity to test the claim.

In article 7 we find again:

> No claim or account—

Think of the astounding necessity of this Government, the Congress and the Senate agreeing that they could not manage this property without being audited by the Indians, and stipulating in the law this expression:

> No claim or account shall hereafter be paid by the Government of the United States out of the Chickasaw fund unless the same shall have been first considered and allowed by the Chickasaw Legislature.

That remained the law until the Atoka treaty of 1897.

We find similar language repeated again in article 8 of the same treaty, as follows:

> It is further agreed that regular semiannual accounts of the receipts and disbursements of the Chickasaw fund held by the Government shall be furnished to the Chickasaw Council by the Government of the United States.

Imagine, my friends, the absurdity of this Government managing a fund and that management costing more than 100 per cent to do it. Why, it reminds me again of the management of the Choctaw fund. The Choctaws traded with the Government 4,000,000 acres of land in Mississippi for the land out West that the Government thought was a barren waste, but, as Apush-ma-ta-ha said:

> They skinned the Government in the trade of the fairest possessions west of the Mississippi River.

They left with the Government the selling of the residue of the land in Mississippi. When the Government sold it they got $8,000,000 for it, but it cost the Indians $6,000,000 for the Government to sell it, leaving the Indians a residue of $2,000,000, and then the Indians had to pay 25 per cent of it to attorneys to fight the Government for the $2,000,000, and won, but it was 55 years before they got that $2,000,000.

This, my friends, brings us to the proposition, Why is it that those Indians employ attorneys? They employ attorneys because it has never cost them more than 25 per cent, but when they have left it to the Government they have had to pay from 75 to 100 per cent plus. They employ attorneys because it is good business sense.

You have often heard of a $750,000 fee; and before I came to Congress I noticed that when Indian legislation was offered for our State some one would raise that cry or the name of McMurray, and the bill would go off the board, hence this speech. The implication contained in that question was a reflection upon our people, upon the tribes, and upon the governors of those tribes who made the contract. I say to you that the present governor of the Chickasaw Nation, who has held the office 14 years, Gov. Douglas H. Johnston, a relative of Albert Sydney Johnston, of Confederate fame, is the equal of any governor of the surrounding States and surpasses in his judgment of men and measures, in his long-headed foresightedness, and good common sense the chief executive of the State of Oklahoma. Such charge is a reflection upon him. But let us analyze it. When the Government took charge under the Atoka agreement it was with the understanding that the Government was going to make the rolls and manage affairs. The Government made a criminal "botch" of it. They began on their rolls, and they admitted to those rolls upward of 4,000 fraudulent claimants. Johnston came into office and found them on the rolls. I was his private attorney and confidential adviser at that time.

When he selected the firm of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish, I questioned him as to why he did it, and he said to me, "You have told me as a lawyer that no man can represent one side of a question and with honesty and professional ethics represent the other side. These are the only men of ability in these Nations who have not handled claims against us." Then he gave the other reasons. I approved his choice, and have never had cause to regret it. They went into the fight with a judgment for $20,000,000 of property against the tribes, which judgment had been affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States. All the other attorneys of the two nations derided the idea that by any means a judgment of the Supreme Court could be overturned; it had never been heard of before, but the firm of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish performed the unheard-of supposed impossible task. After seven years' battle, in the meantime inducing Congress to create the citizenship court to try the cases over, they wiped from the rolls all but 133 of the 4,000 names. This court had no parallel in the annals of the judiciary of this country. Their contract with the governor was for 9 per cent, and the attorneys were to pay the court cost, which amounted to $75,000. They took a desperate chance in this contract in a hope to win big fees. But under the law the court was to fix the fee. When the court, composed of Judge Adams, of North Carolina; Judge Weaver, of Ohio; and Judge Foote, of California, fixed the fee, they agreed on $750,000, or 4½ per cent. The claimants had contracts of from 25 to 50 per cent of all they recovered with nearly all the lawyers in the Chickasaw and Choctaw country.

These lawyers, of course, were swept off their feet. They saw a fortune slip from them. Some of them began to announce in the press that these attorneys had bought the court, and appealed to Congress to reopen those rolls. They were given aid by Secretary Hitchcock, who joined the cry in a vain attempt to rid himself of criticism for mismanagement of his department and in an effort to strike Gov. Johnston, whose policies for the Chickasaws did not suit him. To illustrate the frauds in those cases, there is one that I remember distinctly now who was admitted with 87 claimants, taking nearly $400,000 worth of property. When they found their written evidence, the testimony that they were Indians was sworn to by five of the most prominent men of the State of Arkansas. Mr. Cornish went to Arkansas and asked one of the judges of that State who was supposed to have been a witness, "What do you know about this testimony?" The judge ejaculated, "I never heard of it; I never swore to that." Then Cornish went to a prominent lawyer whose deposition was in the case, and that lawyer protested, "I never heard of it." So with all the others of these five witnesses. Then he hunted up the notary public who had certified to the depositions and jurat and found that the notary had died five years before the depositions were taken. Not only the testimony but the jurat of the notary public were forged in the office of the lawyer representing these 87 claimants. The entire case was manufactured out of blue sky. Of course, they were wiped from the rolls. So with the balance of them.

Then the cry went up, the "press dope" of the attorneys representing the other side, through the press of our State, the press of Washington, and everywhere, that this $750,000 was divided between the three judges and the three attorneys. Ex-United States Senator Butler, of North Carolina, being now employed as attorney by the claimants, made the charge in his paper, the Caucasian. Judge Adams, then Republican chairman of North Carolina, sued ex-Senator Butler for libel. I went voluntarily from my State to North Carolina to testify. Butler was convicted on the charge, and that stopped that slander against the court. Some of my friends warned me, "You are making a mistake to go to North Carolina in that case. This will injure you in politics." I said, "I do not care. I will go around this earth to testify for an honest man who has done his duty." [Applause.] I realize, too, that it is not politic for me to make this speech. I know, gentlemen, we have men in our State, as you have in yours, whose only claim to character, to integrity, and honesty is based upon denunciation of some man who happens to be unpopular. It is a dirty, cowardly method. We have others whose claim to character and to public applause is based upon a spectacular effort in a moment of moral excitement, just as we have recently had in some prosecutions in probate matters. But the really honest man, the honest, brave man, stands at the threshold of every transaction, and pushes and fights back every attempt at graft, whether it is the work of an unpopular man or the work of the strongest man in the Government. [Applause.]

I believe that Congress ought to understand this situation. We are not through with this slander yet, but it has been removed from Judge Foote and Judge Weaver by death. They have passed "over the river to rest under the shade of the trees," and are far removed forevermore from the foul and slimy slander of cowardly character assassins. Judge Adams had to bear it alone for awhile. Maj. STEDMAN, now a Member of this House, will recall that he was attorney for Judge Adams in the suit against Butler, of which I speak.

It is just for me to say that immediately all the Oklahoma lawyers of character and integrity who represented these claimants abandoned them, and now firms in St. Louis, in Texas, and in this city have undertaken the dirty job by use of slandermongers using the name of McMurray as the "goat" for their raids upon Oklahoma Indians.

But against the Indians' faithful and successful attorneys the slander continues. Now, I want to say, my friends, I have no defense for any Indian lobbyist or Indian lawyer; but lobbyist or lawyer, or whomsoever he may be, who is trying to aid the speedy settlement of our Indian problems, will have my aid so long as I am a Member of Congress. When he does the wrong thing, he has my condemnation. I recite these things to show you the reason.

Now, as to the reflection upon the Chickasaw and Choctaw Tribes. Why should they employ these lawyers and give them 10 per cent? They remembered that the Government charged them all the way from 75 to more than 100 per cent. They remembered that with the handling of other cases these attorneys never charged more than 6 per cent and always winning their cases. In the claim against the Government for the negro lands the Government attempted after the Civil War to force amalgamation between those tribes and their ex-slaves. The Chickasaws declined. The Government held over them a reward or bounty if they would make citizens of their former slaves, but they would not adopt them. They still declined and told the Government to keep their money. When the break-up came the rolls showed that with 6,000 Indians and a little more than 6,000 negroes there are only 12 individual family mixtures, and that is a better record than you find between whites and negroes anywhere in the South, anywhere in the District of Columbia, or anywhere else in this Government. After that attempt to amalgamate them failed they made the Indians agree, in order to get certain concessions, to let the negroes have each 40 acres of land with the privilege of testing the question in the Supreme Court.

And when they agreed to that 40 acres—and almost a mule—then Gov. Johnston wanted to contest with the Government for it; but the Secretary of the Interior opposed him, and the Attorney General of this Government stood in the Supreme Court fighting them. Gov. Johnston employed J. F. McMurray, of the old firm of Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish, who went into court and won it over the protest of the Government; but he has never yet received his fee. There are other like claims against the Government, rightly due these Indians, and it shall be my purpose in Congress to stand behind anybody that is trying to do the right thing to the people of my State, or any portion of them. I shall do this at the risk of being misrepresented.

When I retire to private life I shall carry with me that calm consolation of a man at peace with his mind and conscience. Legislation sometimes goes off on the absurd notion that somebody else is for it or opposed to it. The Indian can recall that he wiped out the court claimants, costing $750,000, to recover $20,000,000 and to correct the mistake of the Government, which cost but 4½ per cent. He can recall again all the other claims successfully terminated without costing exceeding 6 per cent. That, my friends, is the reason why the Oklahoma Indians employ attorneys. They have realized the difficulty of political hazard; they have realized the sad experience in the past, and yet you have propositions offered to this House to make it a criminal offense, as was proposed in the last Congress, for any attorney to engage his service to an Indian tribe without the consent of Congress, even when the Indian is seeking a claim against the Government. Imagine the fallacy if you and I, having a suit at law, for me to determine who your lawyer shall be. This is the issue, and this is the question involved in such proposed restriction. I opposed this restriction, and was misrepresented for it, but the slander availed the author of the restriction nothing.

No greater frauds nor perjuries were ever practiced upon a people or imposed upon a nation or disgraced the judiciary than the citizenship frauds of the Chickasaw and Choctaw Nations, and yet the Government is urged to a repetition of this crime. This Congress is surrounded by an attorney—W. Ballinger—of Washington City, and Cantwell & Crewes, two attorneys of St. Louis, who have given to the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs a list of more than 8,000 claimants, and are seeking to reopen the rolls and take from these tribes forty-odd millions of dollars. They admit that they have from 25 to 50 per cent contingent fees if they enroll these claimants, or an aggregate sum of from eight to twelve millions of dollars; and while you are talking about the $750,000, have you ever stopped to think that possibly these attorneys, whose names are not mentioned by the press—but had you stopped to think that they have more contingent money with which to bribe than all the money or contracts ever held by Mansfield, McMurray & Cornish, or either of them? This may explain why these claims persist. The reopening of these rolls would wipe out these Indian estates, becloud titles, and disturb business, to say nothing of the delay of a final settlement, beyond the power of man to estimate on the east half of our State. It would be no less than a crime.

We will have not only in this bill but in other bills that will come before this body questions of great moment, and I want you to remember these tribes understand their business and have managed it successfully, and we hope you will understand when you legislate for them that that legislation ought to be different from that for other tribes that have yet a degree of savagery. Because, I repeat again, three of these tribes were never savage; they may not have had a Christian civilization, but they had at least a pagan civilization equal to that of the Chinese or the Japanese when Perry executed his treaty.

If the Chickasaws, Choctaws, Cherokees, Creeks, and Seminoles have not always been civilized, what is that dynamic force that persists in engrafting itself upon our civilization? No less than four States have their names from their vocabularies. From Virginia to Colorado the map of the Republic is plastered with the nomenclature of these tribes. We find them on the hilltops, in the canyons and valleys, towns, cities, and hamlets, among the names of our citizens and everywhere—we find them in all three of the branches of our State government, in both Houses of Congress, even our money bears the name of Gabe Parker, Registrar of the Treasury, a Choctaw Indian. What is this force, this influence? Is it civilization or is it something, though akin to civilization, but beyond it, a moral force, a divine decree?

Moreover, in addition to all this force their blood must have mingled with ours. Did you ever ask yourself the question what became of all of the four or five millions of Indians on this continent when European settlement was made. We would scarcely care to admit that we have killed all except 327,425, which is the exact number identified by the Indian Bureau of the Government. The last census shows 265,683, which is less than the Indian Bureau number. We have of these 101,170 in the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma and 16,274 on the west side of the State, or over one-third of all Indians in the United States. Nor can we believe that 4,000,000 Indians died of disease, since there has never been any great epidemic, contagion, or pestilence to carry away any great numbers of them. In view of the fact, notwithstanding their contamination with white men with congested population creating diseases for many years, they are growing in number. I ask what became of them? We can but conjecture that they have been amalgamated and assimilated by the American people. In the making of the various treaties for the past 130 years, the references to provisions made for white men who lived among them give color to this conjecture; and if true, how absurd it would be to reopen the Indian rolls to admit persons because of Indian blood. Hence the necessity of holding the rolls to those who have remained a part of the tribe or Nation, and who have never expatriated by becoming citizens of some other State and thereby losing their property rights, just as an American citizen by expatriation would lose his interest in the common American property, including the public domain, by swearing allegiance to the Crown of England or any foreign government.

I see that my time is flying. I would be glad if all the Members of Congress could understand that we have not altogether the grafter on one side and the Indians on the other. The question of graft does not run with the race. Some of the worst grafters we have in the State are mixed-blood Indians, used as interpreters between the full bloods and whites, and also that some of the best friends the Indians have are white men. The Indians themselves understand that. There is no conflict between honest white men and honest Indians in the State of Oklahoma. The average merchant, the average farmer, with the Indian—or 85 or 90 per cent of the Indians—stand together shoulder to shoulder for the settlement of these affairs. There is no conflict. The only conflict is against the organized graft and greed, and sometimes it is difficult to defeat them. Why? Because they are always organized, and because in a moment of lull the politician and the demagogue, especially the cowardly politician, will use denunciation of some unpopular man to deceive the people about his purpose, thereby goes into office without declaring a policy on any question, with a view to exciting the admiration of the honest men. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, our people realize the unsavory things that have been said about them since the advent of Statehood. But, my friends, you must remember that Oklahoma did not grow. Every other State was settled, and you can mark its colonization period, its period of development, its period as a Territory, and, finally, the development to statehood as it grew with "an idea" on becoming a State. Our State did not grow; it was made—manufactured. Within one man's lifetime two-thirds of it—that portion not embracing the Five Tribes—within the memory of men has been settled and a full government established.

So in the very nature of things we did not know one another; we have made mistakes. We have sometimes elected dishonest men. We have sometimes elected incompetent men, but our people have reached the period when they look not so much for what a man may stand for, but for men who will fill the only true definition of a good officer—an honest, wise, and brave man. Above everything else with them is honesty, truthfulness, integrity, and morality—character. In the future you will find this to be the hope of our people. This is best shown in the matter of the recent visit by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs when the county judges all over the east half of the State were eager for cooperation with the commissioner; they unanimously adopted proper rules to govern probate procedure, anxious to do the right and honest thing. Our people are honest, are men of integrity, and men of character; although they may differ on fundamental and general issues, they stand for a speedy settlement of our Indian problems. [Applause.]

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, to many men in Congress the service at Washington, the political market place of the Nation, affords the first and perhaps the only opportunity of their lives to observe at close range and at first hand the attitude of mind which men representative of the various subdivisions of the country entertain toward each other. No student of the great facts of American history can fail, when such opportunity is presented, to search into the feeling which exists between the North and the South to-day, nearly 50 years after the close of the great struggle between them. I can freely say that it has been one of the pleasantest discoveries of my brief service here to find how completely—so far, at least, as I can observe—the old personal sectional bitterness and hatred have passed away. The Nation is happily again a Union indeed.

This is not the only result of the passage of the years. No longer is the South wholly pastoral or agricultural. In the industrial and commercial life of the Nation it has taken a place undreamt of a generation ago. And with these new fields of activity has naturally come an ambition for yet greater achievement for the future. So it has come to pass to-day that in place of the wretched sectional hatred between South and North there has sprung up a keen, vigorous, and, I believe, in the main, a wholesome rivalry in manufactures and in trade between these two portions of the country.

Competition, then, is here. But this competition, like all other, should be fair. As has so often been said by our courts in dealing with restraints of trade, competition may be—indeed, almost necessarily is—selfish; but it must nevertheless conform to the rules of the game. Applying this principle to the business strife between the States of the South and those of the North, it is but human nature that the contention for the mastery should be keen. Just as in matters affecting the Union as a whole, we seek to have our country paramount, and call that aspiration patriotism; just as among individuals there prevails the spirit symbolized by such expressions as "Self-preservation is the first law of nature," "Look out for number one," "Charity begins at home"; so, between States and groups of States having community of interest a similar spirit prevails. I do not commend this spirit, nor claim for it altruism; but I think we can agree that it is at least well-nigh universal human nature and that it must be reckoned with as such.

As we all know in a general way, but as I shall attempt to develop more in detail in the course of my remarks, the South is to-day supreme in the Congress of the United States. That being true, it is not for her to lose sight, in the natural anxiety for the material prosperity of her people, of the responsibility which she owes to the Nation as a whole; and it is for us who represent the States of the North to be zealous that she shall not lose sight of this national duty and obligation.

My remarks will be addressed in some detail to the problems suggested by these considerations. I desire to emphasize that what I shall say is uttered in no narrow spirit of sectionalism or of criticism, in no desire to wave the bloody shirt, but in the confidence that to the personal bitterness of days gone by between the North and South has succeeded a keen, yet friendly, business rivalry which we should all strive to foster along right lines. I shall avoid, so far as may be, expressions of personal opinion and shall seek to make plain, by reference to accessible publications, the different steps of my argument.

Oftentimes a man who feels that injustice is being done, intentionally or otherwise, to him or to what he represents is deemed to acquiesce therein if he does not make such vigorous protest as lies in his power. I do not desire hereafter to be considered estopped, because of previous silence, from making such protest against much of the legislation which has, since the Democratic Party took control of the Government, been put upon our statute books. I purpose, then, to take up, one by one, as briefly as may be, perhaps half a dozen instances of recent legislation which seem to me to work a clear discrimination in favor of the States of the South and against the constituency which I represent.

I. THE INCOME TAX.

Section 8 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States provides in part that—

All duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

The Supreme Court of the United States has construed this language to prohibit an income tax levied upon large incomes, regardless of State lines, and to require a tax apportioned among the several States in proportion to population. To overcome this situation, an amendment to the Constitution was adopted a year ago, and, pursuant thereto, the tariff act, which became operative October 3 last, contains an income-tax section imposing a tax upon incomes, wherever found, in excess of a stated minimum.

It is difficult to ascertain just the proportion of the total amount to be raised under this new law which will be borne by the several States. I have made inquiries of the Treasury Department's experts and of the statisticians connected with the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Ways and Means Committee of the House, but have been unable to obtain from any of them even a guess on this point. About all they are able to tell me is that approximately 500,000 men will, for the first year when a full tax is levied, pay about $82,673,000. See Senator SIMMONS's remarks on the conference report on October 2, 1913, page 6055 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. In an effort to determine what the share of Massachusetts would be in this eighty-odd million dollar amount I have assembled figures showing the relative developed resources of Massachusetts, the relative amount upon deposit in all banks of Massachusetts, its savings deposits, and the amount which it contributed to the income tax in Civil War times. While it is impossible to say positively just what Massachusetts' share will be, I feel perfectly confident in my own mind that it will approach $6,000,000. I feel equally confident, after similar computations, that the seven States of West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana will altogether pay about the same sum. Yet these seven States have a population of over three times that of Massachusetts and an area of about thirty-eight times that of Massachusetts.

I do not adduce these facts in an attempt to criticize the enactment of an income-tax law, in the principle of which I fully believe. I do, however, desire to lay stress upon the tremendous burden to which Massachusetts is thus subjected as compared with that borne by seven great Southern States whose representatives here in Congress, as I shall show later more in detail, are largely responsible for this legislation.

In this connection I desire to quote at some length the words of a great publicist discussing this very matter:

> The provision of the Constitution which requires direct taxes to be imposed according to the rule of apportionment was a shield provided for each State to protect it against oppression by any combination of other States. In entering into the Constitution every State was surrendering its own several powers to impose taxes upon its citizens and to enjoy the proceeds of taxation; it was surrendering that power to a body in which it was manifest there might easily arise a combination or a community of interest and opinion which would lead to taxation injurious to the State which was surrendering its power. In order to guard against that surrender ever being used to the vital injury of any State, this shield was set up before every State—the requirement that direct taxes should be levied in accordance with the rule of apportionment. It is certainly true that the voluntary surrender of this protection, which was a part of the terms of union, imposes a very high responsibility upon the representatives of the country at large in whose hands this vast and now uncontrolled power is vested. Remember that the protection of the rule of apportionment was a part of those compromises in the Constitution which gave to the smaller States the same representation in the United States Senate that the greatest State has; remember that when the States of New York and Pennsylvania and New Jersey and Massachusetts gave their consent to having the smaller and least populous States represented by as many votes in the Senate as any State was represented by they did it with this protection. So the State of Nevada, with 84,000 people, has as many votes in the Senate as has the State of New York, with 10,000,000 people, and the State of New York has voluntarily relinquished its constitutional protection against unfair taxation without asking any increase of its representation to correspond to its responsibility and to the possibilities of the contributions which may be required of it. So the assent of the great industrial communities, mainly in the East, to the imposition of an income tax, without regard to the rule of apportionment and without any increase of their representation in the Senate, casts upon the representatives of other States the highest obligation of consideration, moderation, and fairness toward those great States that trust in their sisters to be fair and not to the protection of the old constitutional provision.

We must remember that if Massachusetts has more taxable incomes than the States of the South, it has vastly more demands in other directions which it must also meet. This Nation can not endure, nor can a truly free government be maintained, unless the representatives in Congress feel that responsibility and duty of moderation which will lead them to be just to every section of the land.

II. THE TARIFF.

Can it be said that the schedules of the recent tariff act in all respects reflect that sense of fairness, that moderation toward all sections of the country which we of New England have a right to expect and demand in our legislation? I prefer not to answer this question directly, but to put before you a few specific instances out of many which might be cited which seem to me to have a bearing upon this problem. The numbers following the commodities mentioned refer to the paragraphs of the tariff act.

Wheat and wheat flour (644), corn or maize (465), corn meal (466), all flour except rice (435, 589, 590, and 644), and fish (483), are articles of food in general use, are all raised primarily in the North, and all come in duty free. Rice and rice flour (193); lemons, limes, oranges, and grapefruit (220); peanuts (225); and pineapples (222), are also articles of food in general use, are all raised primarily in the South, but are all protected.

Wool of the sheep (650), raised mainly in the North, comes in free of duty; hair of the Angora goat (305), raised almost wholly in Texas, is protected.

Bags or sacks of jute (281), used mainly in the North, are, on the other hand, subject to a duty, while bagging for cotton (408), used almost altogether in the South, is free.

Band iron for cotton ties, used in the South for baling cotton (509), comes in duty free. All other hoop, band, or scroll iron, and barrel hoops of iron or steel (107), used in the manufactures of the North, are subject to a duty.

Smooth wire (114) and wire rods (113), the raw material manufactured in the factories of the North, are dutiable, while, curiously enough, the finished product, such as wire nails (554), barbed wire, galvanized wire fencing, and baling wire (645), used largely in the South, come in free. A member of the Ways and Means Committee, discussing these very paragraphs, said in the course of the debate on the bill:

> Perhaps the most peculiar of the political classifications is that which puts smooth wire on the dutiable list, but when it is further developed by being twisted and barbed to make barb wire it is made free, as another bid for the farmer's vote. Is it any wonder that a bill containing such provisions is framed in secret caucus and behind closed doors?

The instances above cited are by no means exhaustive. There are similar ones to be found in the cotton schedule and in almost every other schedule of the bill. Is it not an almost hopeless strain upon our credulity to assume that all these inequalities are merely coincidences rather than the result of careful calculation and design?

III. RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Under this heading I desire to make a rough tabulation of the amount which Massachusetts will contribute to the resources of our National Treasury, as compared with the share borne by the States of Florida and Texas. I do not take these two States because they are, to my knowledge at least, exceptional, but because I think they are fairly representative of great States to which liberal appropriations for rivers and harbors have in recent years been made.

The income of the United States Government will be derived, when the income tax is fully in operation, from three great sources: Customs duties, internal revenue, and the income tax. Florida will probably pay about one-eleventh of the amount paid by Massachusetts to the income tax, or about $550,000. For the year ending June 30 last, its customs receipts amounted to about two and one-half million dollars and its internal-revenue receipts to about one and one-half million dollars. Thus, its total contribution, assuming the same general customs and internal-revenue returns in the future as in the past, will be about four and one-half million dollars.

The contribution of Texas to the income tax will be about one-half that of Massachusetts, or $3,000,000; its customs receipts, about $4,000,000; and its internal-revenue receipts, about $75,000; a total of a little over $7,000,000.

Massachusetts' share of the income tax will be, as we have seen, about $6,000,000; its customs receipts $25,000,000; and its internal-revenue receipts, $7,000,000; a total of $38,000,000. Of course, it may be argued that the customs receipts collected at Massachusetts ports are not wholly attributable to State consumption, and that is true; but doubtless the same condition prevails with regard to the two Southern States cited—to a considerable extent at least—and it is not probable that the disparity is of sufficient consequence materially to affect the comparison.

How did these three States fare in river and harbor appropriations during the Sixty-second Congress, which was under Democratic control? Massachusetts' rivers and harbors received $884,442; Florida's rivers and harbors received $2,550,000; and Texas' rivers and harbors received $5,198,000; and this in spite of the fact that Massachusetts will contribute to the Treasury of the Nation about eight and one-half times as much as Florida and about five and one-half times as much as Texas. Stated in another way, Massachusetts received 26 cents per capita; Texas, $1.33 per capita; and Florida, $3.38 per capita. Still again, Massachusetts received one-fifth of a mill per dollar of developed resources; Texas, 2 mills per dollar of developed resources; and Florida, 7 mills per dollar of developed resources.

Perhaps it will be argued by some uninformed person that this disparity is due to the fact that Texas, for example, has great rivers of deep potential draft which are crying aloud for development, while Massachusetts, an older State, has received her millions in the past, so that all her rivers are now developed. I am informed by an expert on this subject that the fact is that in the history of the Nation Massachusetts has received for her rivers and harbors $19,000,000, while Texas has already received $37,000,000.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is not Texas about thirty times as large as Massachusetts?

Mr. ROGERS. In area, perhaps, but that is not a proper basis for determining the division among the States.

We who live on the banks of the Merrimac River and who hope to see the wonderful possibilities of that stream developed so that the readily obtained 18-foot channel may bring our coal, lumber, and foodstuffs to our doors were obliged to content ourselves in the Sixty-second Congress with an appropriation for the whole course of the river of $10,000. The treatment of the Connecticut River has also been wholly inadequate.

Let us turn to two rivers in the State of Texas—the Trinity and the Brazos—to see what treatment was accorded them.

I quote from the report of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army for 1913, pages 824–830, passim:

> Boats drawing 6 feet of water can be brought from the ocean to the mouth of this (the Trinity) river. The river above tidal action is a narrow stream with a low-water depth insufficient for even light-draft navigation. Snagging operations were carried on by means of one snag boat and two quarter boats. The expenditures made in cleaning the river have resulted in no increased depth, but the removal of snags and drifts has improved the drainage condition. Owing to the fact that the river is not yet navigable to Dallas (a city of 92,000 people, 511 miles from the sea), the only place at which it can come into active competition with the railroads, no effect on freight rates has been produced.

If this language did not occur in a serious Government report one might be excused for thinking the description a bit of sarcasm. Yet the same report tells us that the amount expended to last June already exceeded one and one-half million dollars. Nearly $400,000 was spent on the river during the year ending June 30 last, and $710,000 was appropriated for the work by the Sixty-second Congress.

Let us turn to the Brazos River (see pp. 792–798, passim, of the same report). The report says:

> A navigable channel of 4 feet exists only when the river is at a stage of about 4 feet, or possibly four months per year in intermittent periods. No advantage has been taken of the improvement above Columbia, 35 miles above the sea. The operations during the year consisted in the removing of obstructions by snagging and the cutting of trees on banks between mile 103 and mile 154. No work was done in the nature of jetty construction or repairs, and the work of that nature that has been done has either been obliterated or is of no further use. No commerce of any note has developed, nor can any be expected until the Brazos River is improved from its mouth up to Waco, a city of 26,000 people 424 miles from the sea, or until the territory about the lower portion is given over more to agriculture than it is now. The improvement has so far caused no effect on freight rates, and no effect is looked for until the river is improved throughout. Amount required to be appropriated for completion of existing project, indefinite.

Over a million and a half dollars has already been expended on this so-called river; $730,000 was appropriated for it by the Sixty-second Congress, and $275,000 was expended during the fiscal year ending June 30 last.

Instead of a teeming population of several hundred thousand which lines the banks of the Merrimac River from its mouth to Lowell, some 25 or 30 miles above, we find as the principal characteristics of these creeks of Texas snags, stumps, and overhanging trees. No industries are reflected in their waters, no commerce awaits the opening up of the 4-foot or 6-foot channel. If it were not for the generosity of a complacent Congress, these rivers would go on in their primeval obscurity to the end of time; but the fertile brain of the able Texas delegation in Congress has discovered here an opportunity for the expenditure of public money, and we in Massachusetts must pay the piper.

IV. PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

In two public-buildings appropriation bills passed by the Democratic Sixty-second Congress 10 Massachusetts projects carried a total appropriation of about $1,000,000.

Oklahoma, less than half as large in population and but one-eighth the size in developed resources, also had 10 projects carrying about an equal amount. Alabama, with but two-thirds the population of Massachusetts and with about one-fifth of its developed resources, received almost half again as much. Tennessee, with about two-thirds of the population and one-fifth of the developed resources, also received a considerably larger appropriation. The South as a whole was given money for 224 projects, carrying appropriations of eleven and one-quarter millions of dollars. New England as a whole was given money for 33 projects, carrying appropriations of about $3,000,000. It is, perhaps, not necessary to pursue this illustration further; and it is difficult to account for the result, except in one way. It certainly can not be said that the States of the South are growing so much faster that they need additional help either for their rivers and harbors or for public buildings out of all proportion to their actual size. The 1910 census discloses that Massachusetts increased 20 per cent in population during the 10 years preceding; Rhode Island, 26.6; and Connecticut, 22.7. Only 4 of the 15 Southern States increased more than Massachusetts, and most of them much less, during the same period. Nor can it be said that the people of the South are so much thriftier than Massachusetts. Massachusetts' savings deposits average $246 per capita, and New England's, $237. The Southern States average $9.89 per capita.

V. AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION.
